AND NOW, ON TO OBSCENITY.

Once again, The Body Politic has been acquitted. After four and a half years, after numberless hearings and appeals, after two trials, the magazine has been cleared of the charge that it used the mails to transmit material that was immoral, indecent and scurrilous.

Ordinarily, it would be a time to celebrate for those of us who have worked to raise money (and consciousness) and those who have contributed cash or good wishes. The victory is ours to savour.

But, as The Body Politic's lawyer has frequently observed, there is nothing ordinary about this case. And so our joy is tempered by unpleasant realities.

First, believe it or not, the Crown could try to appeal this second acquittal. There's nothing to stop them save good sense — and there's no indication they're oversupplied with that commodity.

Second, as its case went down in flames, the Crown wasn't waiting around for the crash. Just three weeks before the retrial, they took out some insurance. They laid obscenity charges against all nine members of The Body Politic Collective for an innocuous article on the etiquette of fist-fucking.

The timing of the charges lead The Fund to conclude that the Crown's aim is not to obtain a conviction, but to keep The Body Politic before the courts, draining it of the financial and human resources needed to keep fighting on the legal front.

This new situation of permanent warfare requires a new approach. The Fund doesn't want to spend $80,000 every time the Crown pushes the button. Even in these days of the sinking, shrinking dollar, that's a lot of money to raise, a lot of money to give.

But whatever strategy we adopt to continue our defence of The Body Politic, we will still have to ask for your support.

We all like to win. And those of us who have placed our bets on The Body Politic have won — twice. Let's make it three out of three. We've defeated charges of immorality and indecency. Now on to obscenity.

Hail and farewell

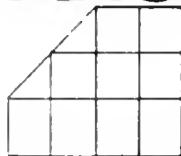

The "Men Loving Boys Loving Men" case is over, and a full accounting from the Free the Press Fund will appear in due course. But we can't wait until then to thank that extraordinary group of people — you — who have backed us with letters, encouragement and hard cash to the tune of more than $80,000.

That four-and-a-half-year battle was draining, expensive, sometimes frightening, sometimes exhilarating, but always charged with the sense that it was a full community enterprise. To everyone: donors, letter-writers, people who sent flowers, the supporters who packed the courtroom — more gratitude than we can easily express.

Sexual hierarchy rejected

I read with growing interest Sue Golding's review of the recent publication of the SAMOIS Collective, Coming to Power (TBP, May). Golding finishes her review with the following statement: "It is an attempt to remind us all that we must continue our fight to define sexual relations on our own terms as something valid and important.... Only one small question remains: are you going to be part of the problem or part of the solution in the fight for the sexual liberation of women?"

Though it is not clear in this statement what Golding is advocating as "part of the solution" and what she is condemning as "part of the problem," the general drift of her review of the SAMOIS book leads one to infer that SM activity is in the eye of the defining hurricane of women's sexuality, and that all dykes owe it to themselves to check it out and become "part of the solution." I don't think Golding is talking about "talking about it" as part of the "solution," though SAMOIS is there for exactly that. No one can "choose" to be an SM lesbian anymore than anyone can "choose" to be a lesbian at all. You are or you aren't. It follows that being an SM lesbian is no more a political act than being a lesbian at all. The question is political when it enters the realm of how that desire is used and affirmed. To quote from the book that Golding was reviewing: "The idea that there is an automatic correspondence between sexual preference and political belief is long overdue to be jettisoned" (Gayle Rubin, "The Leather Menace"). Golding must have skipped that page, because throughout her positive review of this important book, she insists on calling the kettle black.

People who are doing and thinking things that are of political import to other people shouldn't be smug about that — SAMOIS certainly isn't. Angry under fire they are, smug they aren't. But Golding seems to be placing SM activity on a rung on some ladder she invented somewhere, and due to this relativism that she sets up in the piece, she has hierarchically placed any non-SM sexual activity considerably lower on that same ladder. It's a hierarchy that isn't limited to the challenge in her conclusion.

Gratuitous comments on non-SM relations include "...SM is not performed against a woman's will. Moreover it is not emotional SM blackmail — the typical 'mind-fuck' game-playing often present in lesbian relationships." Wait just one minute there, Ms Golding. Are you saying that sexually SM lesbians are so superiorly balanced that they don't have the socio-economic problems that every other woman in the world has, not to mention lesbians? Are you saying that their purported ability to overcome the extreme social pressures on their relationships are related to their sexual desire? Are you telling me that if I engage in ritualized SM sex with my lover that our insecurities due to our position of marginality and oppression will cease to plague our emotional interaction?

Emotional problems or the penchant to "mind-fuck" are a question of the individual and her reaction on an intimate level to her socialization and what goes on around her. That doesn't go away just because at one point individuals dress up and agree to disagree. Emotional stability is no more linked to sexual practice than is political correctness or incorrectness.

What Golding misses is that prejudice doesn't go away by reversing it: it goes away by informing people about the actual things that they are prejudging. Ideally, all lesbian sex is "a form of eroticism based on the consensual exchange of power," and I can't think of any relationship of any kind I know that doesn't include role-playing at some level or another as an intrinsic part of that relationship. There can be no "grading" of this activity politically.

So let's not create a hierarchy within the relative "freedom" from it that our unequivocal rejection as lesbians by society in general allows us. Let's talk about what we are and what we mean and take the differences as a given, a respected given.

Vive le ghetto!

Jonathan Bowe's letter in the May issue ("Disch and disbelief") concerning the ghetto attitude that many gays have raises a valid point. What he fails to realize is that the ghetto must exist.

The ghetto must exist because it is in the ghetto that gays first come out. It is in the ghetto that gays live and work and play every day. We are all, like it or not, animals of the ghetto. We are subject to both its advantages and disadvantages.

The ghetto is often perceived as a bad place, but that is the wrong assumption. The ghetto preserves and protects gays and their subculture. I would hope that TBP will continue to serve the ghetto as it has done so faithfully in the past.

Long live the ghetto and the ghetto attitude!

McMurtry's disrepute

I was very gratified at the news that The Body Politic had been acquitted of the charges that had been laid against it.

But now that that particular episode in the continuing official harassment of the gay community is over, we must give thought to the way in which we can effectively resist the discrimination that is still being practised by the present authorities against some facilities and individuals in our community.

It is somewhat ironic that TBP's acquittal occurred almost simultaneously with the coming into force of Ontario's latest human rights legislation, which, as we all know too well, refuses to extend to homosexual persons the same basic human rights now enjoyed by all other minority groups in this province. At least it demonstrated that our judiciary is more enlightened than our ruling politicians.

There is no way the present Attorney General can escape responsibility for bringing both himself and his high office into disrepute. By pressing for a new trial on the same charges of which TBP had already been acquitted, Mr McMurtry demonstrated his basic contempt both for the judicial process and for the concept of the rule of law, both tenets that he is bound to uphold. Thank God we have men on the bench such as Mr Thomas Mercer who have the courage to do what they know is right, legally and morally.

The rights of all gay people are in danger as long as the rights of any of us are not being respected by the authorities. The recent raid on Glad Day Books is another appalling example of selective prosecution. Each and every one of us must try to find the courage and the means to speak out against these insidious misuses of the law if we are to see the day when all citizens of this province are treated equally and justly by their government.

Blind narcissism

On April 22-24 a national symposium was organized by Multiculturalism Minister James Fleming in conjunction with the federal Justice Department. Its focus? Race relations and the law, "to explore the potential for the law as a more effective tool in combatting racism, and to seek means to improve race relations throughout the legal system." The reason? According to a Multiculturalism Department poll, up to a third of all Canadians would like to see an "all-white Canada."

Because I am what many people call a "Third-World" gay, I am pleading that the gay community (of which I am trying to be part) not forsake in self-complacency its dark horses, and speak out against racism, not only for the sake of its nonwhite members like myself, but also for the million "visible others" who remain fearful yet silently disenchanted, angry yet helplessly alienated. Many lesbians and gays may see the relationship between race and sexual orientation as inherently nonexistent. Yet in view of the growing racial prejudice and overt discrimination in these hard economic times, the gay community must be aware of the implications of this social disease and define its role in fighting this intolerance.

There is no need to point out what terrorist groups like the Ku Klux Klan, the Western Guard, Positive Parents and the League Against Homosexuals have in common. They are all based upon a primitive narrow-mindedness and intolerance of all things different, and upon a dangerous readiness to resort to cheap violent means to suppress diversity. The former group advocates racialist supremacy, the latter, heterosexualist supremacy, and both have in the name of morality employed Gestapo tactics to degrade people whom they personally dislike.

It is evident that allying with other oppressed minorities in order to expose hardship and inequality proves to be a very effective tactic to gain public sympathy, to strengthen the community's infrastructure and to develop productive intergroup communications in our struggle against the common oppressor.

However, the common oppressor is not only the police themselves, and such coalitions seem to exist for the sole purpose of self-protection. I am afraid that the gay community has made self-protection against police abuse an end unto itself, and that it reaches out to other groups only when under police coercion. If I am right that, when not hassled by these morality troopers, the community withdraws into itself and becomes largely indifferent to the predicament of those same minority groups who are its much needed allies in times of crisis, then I hope that gays and lesbians should now provide them support against white racism and the white supremacy extremists.

Have gays been caught in their own sociocultural narcissism, in which gay pluralism has come to mean not racial, ethnic or religious differences, but a broad variation of sexual practices and preferences? Has this gay culture become so monolithic and "white-washed" that it turns homosexuality into a strictly North American phenomenon which subtly compels Black, Asian, Latin, Native and East Indian gays to relinquish their backgrounds and to pass as gay "coconuts"?

In their reconstruction of a long-lost gay history and in their effort to embellish the gay culture, have lesbians and gays now abandoned their commitment to a more humane, fair and just society for themselves and for those racial minorities whose civil rights movement has shaped their consciousness?

I too have a dream: that one day people like me will live in a nation where they will not be judged by the colour of their skin nor by the orientation of their sexuality, but by their character. Let us make this dream a reality.

The second time around

Once again an Ontario provincial court judge has found that "Men Loving Boys Loving Men," an article first published in this magazine in November 1977, does not exceed the limits imposed by the Criminal Code of Canada.

Judge Thomas Mercer noted the lack of any allegation, even from the Crown, that the article was calculated to "titillate the senses or cater to prurient tastes." He went on to rule that it is not automatically immoral or indecent to advocate something which society may consider immoral or indecent.

An obvious principle. It should not have required the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars of public money to bring this simple element of our freedom of expression to the attention of the Attorney General.

But, as even Ken Campbell, a former Crown witness against TBP and founder of Renaissance Canada told the press, the second prosecution was brought, not to convict, but to harass.

The Attorney General of Ontario is playing politics with the public's money. Marketing himself as a champion of civil rights to Toronto's older and better established minority groups, he attacks the gay community, pandering to his authoritarian electoral base.

The Body Politic, now accused of publishing obscene material, faces a new trial. We do not doubt that we will be acquitted of this charge as well, after who knows how many lengthy and expensive legal battles. But no matter how insubstantial the charges may be when they are heard in court, the Attorney General already has his headlines. For McMurtry the rest is only public funds.

Our recent acquittal was more than a victory for this magazine and more than a victory for the gay community. It was a victory for everyone who supported our struggle with time and money, for everyone who has said "enough" to the cynical opportunism of the Roy McMurtrys of this world. □

Reflections on a process

The following lines, written in a personal mode by Collective member Stephen MacDonald, reflect the consensus of the Collective.

A few years ago in another city I used to hang around with a gay activist friend of a certain deserved renown. As a type he is not unknown in these circles: young, intelligent, lots of energy, the Politically Correct line on everything and even a little shrill at times. I was the one who was obviously gay to anyone who cared to think about it, but I didn't push it much — subtle, perhaps. Robin was thrilled to proclaim himself at every opportunity. I was frequently embarrassed. We were both afraid and proud.

While time and circumstance seem to have amplified my gay voice a bit, I still have a hard time being really open all the time and in every situation. At the same time, I am increasingly ashamed of how easily my friend could and probably still can embarrass me. I think Robin would agree with me that despite our different approaches we are both coming out. It's a process that certainly has a beginning and each gay person you know plods along through some part of the middle, working at his or her own speed. It has no end.

Recently the question of the use of pseudonyms on articles published here has caused some debate. Our most recent criminal charges are connected to an article written under a pseudonym. At the time of publication we accepted the author's arguments for doing so. We continue to support his position. Each case must be judged on its own merits, and each individual must finally decide how out to be at any given time.

There are no easy guidelines concerning the use of pseudonyms. Coming out goes on forever, and each one of us is screaming or brooding at some stage in that process. The role of The Body Politic is both to challenge and to support. □

TBP acquitted yet again on 1978 charge

Double victory over double jeopardy

Reprise. With variations. For the second time in just over three years an Ontario Provincial Court has ruled that "Men Loving Boys Loving Men" is neither indecent nor immoral. Judge Thomas Mercer stood before a crowded College Park courtroom the morning of June 15, said "The charge is dismissed" while the audience was still settling into the room's long wooden benches, and walked back into his chambers before most onlookers realized what he had done.

It was only moments later when defence lawyer Clayton Ruby excitedly read the five-page decision to reporters and TBP supporters huddled outside in the hall that the full impact registered. Orchestrated with cliff-hanging suspense worthy of Conan Doyle, Mercer's judgment drily summarized the case's main points for four pages before delivering its unadorned verdict: "The article, offensive though it may be to many people, is not indecent or immoral. The charge against Pink Triangle Press is dismissed."

A key element in both Crown prosecutions of this article has been the question of advocacy. On page 4 Mercer wrote: "I find that the article does, in fact, advocate pedophilia." The hearts of many in the noisy corridor sank as Ruby read those words. It seemed like a prelude to accepting the Crown argument that advocacy meant indecency and immorality. But not so.

In what Ruby described as a "precedent-setting judgment," Mercer clearly ruled that in spite of advocating indecent and immoral acts, "Men Loving Boys Loving Men" would be tolerated by the Canadian community. "We now know something we never knew before in Canadian law," Ruby jubilantly told the waiting press. "It is perfectly legal to advocate what in itself would be unacceptable to most Canadians."

TBP workers and their friends were relieved but markedly less ecstatic than they had been when Provincial Court Judge Sydney Harris announced the same verdict (for somewhat different reasons) on February 14, 1979. At that time, they held a major press conference before boozy celebrations which lasted far into the night. This time it was back to TBP's office, two bottles of a modest domestic champagne shared among a dozen staffers, and business as usual.

Four and a half years have taken their toll. Two major trials, a Crown appeal of the first acquittal, an order for a retrial, unsuccessful appeals of that order to the Ontario Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Canada, defence costs approaching $85,000 — all these have had a certain wearying effect.

Instead of partying with supporters at a popular bar as they did after the 1979 victory, TBP's collective spent the evening of June 15 in a long and taxing discussion of legal strategies for the trial it will face November 1 on obscenity charges for publishing "Lust with a Very Proper Stranger." As collective member and "Men Loving Boys Loving Men" author Gerald Hannon explained, "I guess we've learned that to continue

doing our job printing what we believe the gay community should read means seeing ongoing harassment as a constant reality."

The man who brought Anita Bryant and virulent public homophobia to Toronto might seem unlikely to echo Hannon's words. But when asked by TBP for a comment on the second acquittal, Ken Campbell, Baptist minister and leader of Renaissance International, replied, "Without even seeing the reasons for acquittal, I can say that someone in the government of Ontario is out to deny the fundamental human rights of homosexuals and (TBP's) right to publish for them."

Campbell, a Crown witness in 1979, decried the charges as "frivolous prosecution." He explained that the Crown's first case against the article "clearly had no heart in it" and the even less energetic second prosecution "adds proof that the charges themselves are seen as doing all the damage."

Campbell also called for reimbursement of TBP's defence costs. "It's a horrendous thing that a publisher should be dragged through the courts twice, acquitted twice, and still have to pay the shot. A government that plays that game should also pay for the game," he said.

Prosecution motives were questioned by Judge Mercer himself when he asked Crown attorney Peter Griffiths why such a rarely used charge had been laid. On June 3, the fourth day of the retrial, Mercer interrupted Griffiths' summation to remark, "I think a lot of thought went into the laying of this charge." He surmised that the charge had been chosen "to cut off defences" which would have been more readily available had a more frequently contested section of Canada's Criminal Code been invoked.

Watson: "the public would tolerate it"

On the second floor of an Art Deco architectural monument which once housed Eaton's College Street department store, now redecorated to resemble a thousand bland flight-departure lounges, the new trial judge heard careful expert testimony from 15 defence witnesses and not a single witness for the Crown. In fact, the only Crown evidence was Exhibit I: a copy of the December 1977/January 1978 issue of TBP which contained Gerald Hannon's now notorious look into the lives of Simon, Barry and Peter, men

Trial II, take one

The Body Politic returns to the courts November 1 to face charges of "publishing obscene written matter," specifically an article entitled "Lust with a Very Proper Stranger" published in the April 1982 issue.

Charged May 10 were all nine members of the TBP editorial collective and Pink Triangle Press, the paper's publisher. The charges followed a raid on TBP's office May 7 by two Metro Toronto police morality officers. Nothing was seized in the raid.

If convicted under Section 159(1) of the Criminal Code, collective members each face a maximum penalty of $1,000 fine and six months imprisonment. Pink Triangle Press could receive an unlimited fine.

"Lust with a Very Proper Stranger" is an article which describes the rituals and etiquette of list-fucking. It was written by "Angus MacKenzie," a journalist who preferred to remain anonymous for professional reasons.

who loved boys who loved them.

For most of June 2, the third day of the hearing, a face familiar in Canadian living rooms for the last 26 years smiled engagingly from the witness box. Academic, broadcaster, Officer of the Order of Canada (the country's highest civilian honour), former co-host of This Hour Has Seven Days — easily the most controversial weekly TV public affairs programme in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's history — Patrick Watson recalled nationally televised interviews with American Nazi leader George Lincoln Rockwell, convicted child murderer Nathan Leopold, and Hitler's architect Albert Speer.

"There were death threats and demonstrations when I interviewed Rockwell in 1965," Watson told the court, "but people said afterwards that even though it was awful, they still thought they should know about these things."

Under detailed cross-examination, Watson distinguished between advocating an idea and advocating an action. He testified that "Men Loving Boys Loving Men" did advocate the idea of pedophilia by showing that at least some pedophiles are admirable.

"TH White, author of The Once and Future King, the Greek poet Anacreon, and Leonardo da Vinci were all pedophiles," he pointed out, "and if I wrote a letter to The Globe and Mail (Canada's national newspaper) saying they were admirable, I'm sure The Globe would print it."

Watson explained to Crown attorney Griffiths that controversial journalism "serves an illuminating function in a democracy by provoking people to think and discuss." He said that he would have no hesitation in reading key passages of "Men Loving Boys Loving Men" on TV to provoke debate, "and I know the Canadian public would tolerate it."

Further dramatic evidence of seasoned journalists' estimation of community standards of tolerance for sympathetic portrayals of man/boy love came from CBC producer Max Allen and from Michael Cobden, editor-in-chief of the Kingston Whig-Standard.

Allen, with 12 years of experience in CBC radio, including more than five years as producer of the award-winning nightly public affairs programme Ideas, is chairman of CBC Radio's committee on controversial programming. He played a 20-minute taped excerpt of an Ideas programme from the six-part series "On Being Gay," originally aired across the country in 1979. Among other voices heard in the courtroom was that of Gerald Hannon, explaining to an interviewer how his views on man/boy love had developed while researching the article before the court.

"We received 1,300 letters in response to that programme," Allen testified, "and that's far more than usual. Of the 1,300, exactly 11 were negative. And eight of those were worded almost identically, were unsigned, and were postmarked in the same city."

Michael Cobden characterized Kingston, Ontario, as an old, medium-sized, rather conservative city. He edits the city's only local newspaper, which is read by up to 100,000 people each day, at least half of whom live in nearby small towns and rural areas. "If pedophilia were an issue in Kingston, then I would not hesitate to publish 'Men Loving Boys Loving Men' in the Whig-Standard with some editing, but only for stylistic reasons," Cobden told the court. "It's clearly an earnest attempt to look at a taboo subject. Most of my readers are older, family people, but I would not expect any protests from them," he said.

Peter Desbarats, dean of journalism at the University of Western Ontario since last September and Global TV's Ottawa bureau chief for 10 years before that, compared the TBP article to Dostoyevsky and Truman Capote depicting murderers in an understanding way. Under cross-examination, Desbarats refused to make a blanket condemnation of man/boy love and explained, "I want to understand why people do it and to be assured that no harm is done to the boys involved. I find that the article in question gives a sympathetic description of a certain way of life."

"The article is radically different from the 'I stuffed her cunt with my 15-inch prick' school of writing," testified sociology professor Dorothy Smith of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education. Smith, whose specialization is communications theory, explained how the visual impact of TBP's cover, its shape and format, clearly mark it as an opinion magazine which assumes a higher than average level of reading skills. "Only people looking for food for thought and information about a very specialized community would ever pick up this magazine at a newsstand," she told the judge, "and they would expect to find articles such as this one."

The retrial had opened on May 31 with defence testimony from Lynn Cunningham, managing editor of the glossy, 710,000-circulation Quest magazine and vice-president of the 170-member Canadian Periodical Publishers' Association. She was followed by Globe and Mail writer Joanne Kates, United Church chaplain at the University of Toronto Eilert Frerichs, and Humber College journalism teacher Eleanor Wright Peltine, who also edits Content, a magazine for Canadian journalists. Cunningham, Kates and Peltine drew on their experience in print journalism to show how Gerald Hannon did no more than any good reporter would when writing about a controversial topic. "You can't shoot the messenger who brings the bad news," Cunningham insisted.

The court also heard testimony from what the non-gay press loves to call "avowed homosexuals." Toronto General Hospital psychologist Rosemary Barnes, physician Randy Coates, Ontario Institute for Studies in Education sociology professor Tom Greenfield, University of Toronto English professor Michael Lynch, York University lecturer Lorna Weir and Metropolitan Community Church pastor Brent Hawkes all explained to Judge Mercer the significant role played by TBP in the local lesbian and gay community. They commented on their own difficulties in coming to terms with the issue of man/boy love and praised TBP for its role in educating the community on this and other issues of concern to gay men and lesbians.

Defence counsel Ruby's detailed summation centred on three main legal points. He began by citing numerous cases wherein corporations had been found guilty of offences, but their officers had been acquitted because no connection with the crime itself had been proven. Crown attorney Griffiths entered no evidence to show that Gerald Hannon, Ed Jackson or Ken Popert, charged because they were officers of Pink Triangle Press in December 1977, had anything directly to do with mailing the issue of TBP in which the article was published. This point was put so persuasively that Judge Mercer acquitted the three men without further ado on the last day of trial.

Ruby spent half an hour citing cases in which the terms "immoral" and "indecent" have been discussed. He also referred to some where the manner of distribution or the context of a performance have been considered relevant in determining the degree to which community standards of tolerance might fluctuate.

His third line of defence made use of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which forms a part of the new Canadian Constitution. For the first time in its history Canada now has a written constitution which guarantees freedom of speech. Ruby argued that, although the charter is only two months old and has yet to be tested fully in the courts, it was clearly applicable to the present case.

In his decision, Mercer pointed out that he relied on ordinary dictionary meanings of "indecent" and "immoral" in exonerating TBP and thus did not have to consider this third argument. As June 15 drew to a close and with it what is hoped will be the last act in the "Men Loving Boys Loving Men" black comedy, Toronto Sun columnist Claire Hoy was decrying the acquittal as "sick" and Crown attorney Griffiths was telling TBP that the judgment is "under review" and the Crown could announce another appeal in 10 days' time.

Meanwhile, eight shipping cartons of materials seized when TBP's office was raided by police porn squad officers in December 1977 languish in a warehouse somewhere, awaiting further legal action for their recovery.

Police open sex-offender rumour file to youth agency

TORONTO — Metro Toronto Children's Aid Society will use confidential police files, including a list of potential sexual offenders, to evaluate all future job applicants, volunteers, adoptive parents and present employees transferring to positions involving children. The agency adopted the policy June 10 over protests from its employees' union.

The board of directors gave CAS executive director Doug Barr sole veto power over hiring once he has obtained permission from the applicant to review three kinds of police files. Lists of people with convictions and outstanding charges are available from both the Canadian Police Information Centre computer file and Metro Toronto Police records. A third list Barr will be inspecting is called the Potential Sexual Offender File.

The use of police files has angered Canadian Union of Public Employees officials as well as gay social workers who fear that rumours and groundless complaints may begin to play too large a part in assessing an applicant's competence.

Reviewing such information is a "flagrant violation of human rights," according to Michael Jones, president of CUPE Local 2316, which represents more than 500 CAS employees. Jones worried that the Potential Sexual Offender File could contain unreliable information based upon malicious complaints and the value judgments of police officers biased against homosexuals.

Barr dismissed these objections. He said that he would be looking only for evidence of "inappropriate adult behaviour" which would make an applicant a "potential risk" to children. This behaviour would be anything which, in his opinion, could place a child "in need of protection" as defined by the Child Welfare Act.

Barr admitted that potential sexual offender lists would not be as precise or legally as sound as material in other files and could contain "suspicions the police have, reports of complaints, and allegations not substantiated in a court of law."

Gay social workers are upset by the new CAS policy. Since it remains a common misconception that all gay people are child molesters, gays in child-care positions feel that their job security is extremely tenuous. "It's a misuse of information," said a member of the low-profile Association of Gay Social Workers, who asked that his name not be used. "In effect, it's conviction without a trial."

Several years ago, CUPE Local 2316 attempted to negotiate a non-discrimination clause into their union contract. The clause, which included sexual orientation, was quickly dropped after adverse media coverage caused Ontario's Minister of Community and Social Services to oppose job protection for gay people.

Barr said he would disregard any complaints of a homophobic nature in the Potential Sexual Offender File. "Mere notation of someone being gay is of no immediate concern to me. It's not the practice of the CAS to ask applicants their sexual orientation." He said he was quite aware that there are gay people working for the society.

Metro Toronto Police are hedging on whether they would make their files available to the CAS or whether a potential sexual offender list even exists. Barr has no doubts. "They're somewhere in the computer bank," he said. Inspector Maurice Wilson of the police identification bureau told TBP that police files are confidential and available only to police and the courts.

Why did CAS institute this policy now? "It's partly the result of increased expectations, on the part of the public, of tighter accountability," Barr explained. He said three recent problems with employees and foster parents could have been avoided if a record of previous convictions or repeated warnings had been available to him.

Barr said that the policy will be reviewed at the end of a year, at which time he would be better able to recommend ways of controlling his own discretionary powers.

Take name off abuser list: worker

VANCOUVER — A gay social service worker's fight to regain his job has expanded to include a battle to have his name removed from a list of potential child abusers.

Rob Joyce was dismissed February 3 from his job as a counsellor at Senator House, a hostel for street youth. Official reasons ranged from using working hours "to attend to matters of a personal nature" to "being uncooperative, unpleasant, demanding and hostile." The dismissal followed his efforts to clear his name of an allegation that he paid a hustler $60 for a blow-job (see TBP, March).

While the youth had made the allegation as early as January 17, a complaint was not registered with the Protections Complaints Bureau of the provincial Ministry of Human Resources (MHR) until February 22. MHR policy dictates that complaints must be registered within 24 hours.

Joyce did not hear that a report had been made until May 7. He was not notified by the MHR, but rather was told by the social worker who prepared the report.

The Protections Complaints Bureau established a registry in 1965 listing suspected and confirmed child-abusers. Until recently, registrants were not even notified that a complaint had been made against them, nor were there any grounds for appeal.

The British Columbia Civil Liberties Association (BCCLA) has been struggling for two years to allow suspects the right of appeal, to have policy changed so that registrants are notified and to severely limit access to the information.

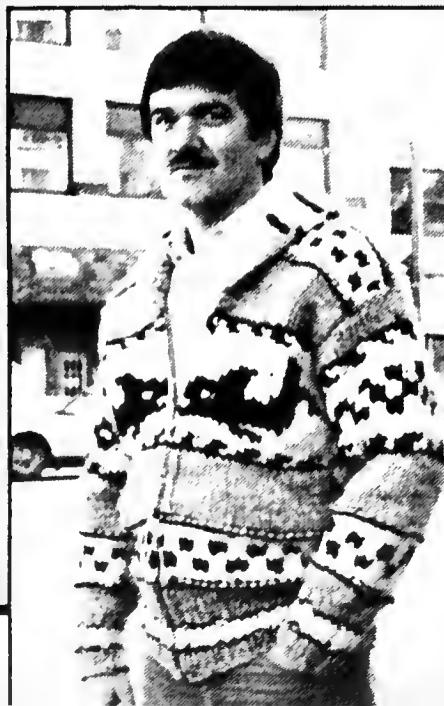

In June, following extended pressure from the BCCLA and the provincial Ombudsman's office centring around the Joyce case, MHR deputy minister John Noble announced that new procedures have been implemented. Registrants are now to be notified, and unsubstantiated cases reviewed after three years.

Joyce's case has been included among the "unsubstantiated" cases. Noble stated in a letter to Joyce that "No evidence corroborating the statements of the juvenile was found during the investigation."

Nevertheless the allegation will stand, it seems, for at least three years. Said Joyce, "I feel that I've been one of the best job counsellors in Vancouver and now I'm blacklisted and unemployable."

Meanwhile Joyce is awaiting the release of the Ombudsman's report before taking any further action for his reinstatement.

Military hiring ban lifted: for a day

OTTAWA — The Canadian Armed Forces reversed their long-standing ban on hiring homosexuals last month, but the change in policy lasted a few brief hours and appeared to be merely the expression of a personal opinion by the Minister of National Defence.

The confusion began May 25 when NDP Justice Critic Svend Robinson told a House of Commons national defence committee about two cases of enlisted persons who had been victimized by the policy excluding homosexuals. One was a woman who had been "harassed and intimidated" because it was alleged she had lesbian contacts at Canadian Forces Base Borden. The other, a young man stationed at (radar unit) Falconbridge, "was kicked out because it was alleged that he was a homosexual."

Robinson asked the Hon Gilles Lamontagne, Minister of National Defence, why the Forces continue to maintain such a policy.

"In the Canadian Armed Forces we are very respectful of fundamental human rights and individual liberties," Lamontagne began. To the surprise of most people in the committee room, however, he then added, "As far as I am concerned, I am not aware of any discrimination strictly on the grounds of sexual orientation." He went on, "Solely on that (ground), I do not think there should be any discrimination."

The minister's statement, according to Robinson, rocked the committee room. "There were about 25 generals lined up along the wall," he reported. As Lamontagne was speaking, "they looked like they were going to have a collective heart attack."

General Ramsay Withers, Chief of Defence Staff, leaned across to Lamontagne, according to Robinson, and said in a loud stage whisper, "That's not the policy, Minister." Committee chairman Marcel Prud'homme, aware of the controversial nature of the minister's statement, asked helpfully, "Would you like to suspend briefly?" He observed, "I think there is a consultation about the policy," as a heated private exchange ensued between the minister and his chief of staff. Finally, Lamontagne spoke up, "I think what I said stands."

Robinson, MP from Burnaby, BC, said that he was amazed at the answer. "I didn't think that he would agree with me," Robinson said. "Lamontagne's statement represented a fundamental reversal of policy."

Next morning a reporter got a different response when he contacted the minister's office. Lamontagne told the reporter that the policy had not changed. "Homosexuals can't fulfill some of the requirements that are asked of a recruit — for example, security," he said. "If they can't fulfill some of the requirements, we can't accept them."

Gays of Ottawa spokesperson John Duggan called Lamontagne's statement

"History has shown that homosexual conduct undermines morale and creates conflicts of interpersonal relationships which would have a detrimental effect upon the operational efficiency of the Canadian Forces, particularly in isolated posts, aboard ships and aircraft and in those locations where a substantial portion of the forces is billeted in barracks."

— Col Frank Karwandy, Deputy Judge Advocate General of the Department of National Defence

Lamontagne: giving generals heart attacks

"a policy reversal which offends every principle of human rights and justice. Once again, 'national security' is manipulated to cloak the bigotry of the homophobe." Duggan pointed out the contradictions of the homosexuals-are-prone-to-blackmail argument: "The Government encourages the blackmailing of gays and then punishes the loyal target. Catch-22!"

Homosexuals have been barred from the Canadian Armed Forces for decades. Resistance to changing the policy seems to spring partly from a mind-set constructed during a security clampdown on gay people throughout the government services in the Fifties and early Sixties. Homosexuals, the majority of whom were then in the closet, were thought to be prime targets for blackmail. Although social conditions have changed substantially since then, the policy rationale remains, a curious blend of stereotyping and bigotry.

Kitchener hedges on gay rights ordinance

KITCHENER — Once again, lesbians and gay men have asked their city council to pass a bylaw which would prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation with regard to the city's jobs, services, and facilities, and the council has referred the matter to the civic administration committee for further discussion.

Appearing before the council on June 14, Tom Warner, speaking on behalf of CGRO, informed council members that if they did take this "very positive move," theirs would be the fourth city in the province to do so. Toronto, Windsor, and Ottawa have all passed similar bylaws.

Moe Lyons, representing the Lesbian Organization of Kitchener, explained that while there were many who feared for their own children and relations with their family, "most of us fear for our jobs." Greg Meadows, making reference to a gay man who works for the city, said, "the state of fear and mistrust under which I know he lives is deplorable."

Also appearing before the council were Ruth Songhurst, representing the Waterloo Public Interest Research Group, and Lisa Immeker-Rasler, from CKMS-FM radio.

Joe Szalai promises that if city council doesn't pass a bylaw or written policy, "then it'll be a hot issue at election time."

No donuts for queers

HAMILTON — Members of Hamilton United Gay Societies (HUGS) have been refused service at a local Donut Castle on a number of occasions recently because the manager does not want gays patronizing the restaurant.

At HUGS' April 14 general meeting, a young gay man described how the manager of the donut shop at Duke and James Streets had refused to serve him and his friends, calling them "queers" and telling them to leave. About a dozen HUGS members later arrived at the shop where an employee pointed to one gay youth and said, "I can't serve him." When asked why, she said it was on the manager's orders.

Shortly thereafter, the manager appeared and said he didn't want "queers" causing trouble in his restaurant with "too much laughing." When asked if he would refuse to serve all HUGS members present in the shop he softened his stance slightly but returned to it later in the discussion. Since that date other gay men have been refused service and one was told he would be served only if he were alone.

HUGS sent a letter May 10 to the head office of the Donut Castle chain in Toronto, asking if it was their policy to discriminate against gays. In a phone interview, a secretary claimed that the letter had been received and a reply mailed denying discrimination on the basis of "race, creed, colour, sex or habits." However, as of June 16, no reply had been received by HUGS.

HUGS spokesperson Mike Johnston said that if the situation does not improve the group will consider leafletting the Hamilton Donut Castle to call for a boycott. Meanwhile, the incident is being registered with the Coalition for Gay Rights in Ontario and both the Ontario and Canadian Human Rights Commissions.

Mother's knows best

LONDON — Determination and not a little courage has won Vern Halbot his job back with Mother's Pizza, where he was recently fired for being gay.

Halbot was hired April 28 by Mother's Pizza located at Dundas and Highbury Road. Assistant manager Homi Poppy apparently took an instant dislike to Halbot and asked dining room manager Paula Humphreys, "What is that thing behind the bar?" Five days later Poppy fired Halbot, telling him, "Mother's is not the place for you."

Halbot immediately registered a complaint with the Ontario Human Rights Commission, then contacted the vice-president of personnel for Mother's, Steven Becker, who referred him to Joseph Stein, the London district manager. After meeting with Stein, Halbot was rehired May 30 to the same position but at a different Mother's location.

Halbot asked for a written apology from Mother's but was refused. He was told to "let the dust settle."

Meanwhile, Paula Humphreys, who had refused to fire Halbot, and another woman have quit their jobs at Mother's over the incident. Danny Cockerline □

Club charge dropped

VANCOUVER — The Vancouver city prosecutor dropped charges of violating a civic bylaw against the Club Bath June 9. The charges were dropped on a technicality, but the prosecutor has said the city may lay new charges against four gay baths under the same bylaw.

The Club was charged last year under a Health Department bylaw which contained a number of stringent regulations, including that there be no doors on rooms. These requirements were added to the bylaw in 1978 by the now retired director, Gerald Bonham, who said removing doors would cut down on the transmission of VD.

Club manager Brian Tipper said he felt the charges were a test case to see if the bylaw was enforceable. The bylaw applies to body-rub parlours as well as steam baths. Tipper said Health Department officials had visited most of the baths, but had charged only the Club.

The Club appeared before the Community Services Committee in May to have the bylaw changed. According to Tipper, the committee is willing to consider revising the regulations. Mayor Michael Harcourt has also indicated he is opposed to enforcing the bylaw against the Club. However, the current health director, Dr W Morgan, has stated he feels the bylaw must be enforced, although he agrees the Club is clean and well managed.

Meanwhile, the Club plans to meet again with the Community Services Committee in hopes of preventing further action against gay steam baths.

Morality campaign stops Code changes

OTTAWA — The federal government has withdrawn amendments to the Criminal Code which would have legalized buggery, bestiality and sexual acts between more than two consenting adults.

On June 15, Justice Minister Jean Chrétien presented the federal Justice and Legal Affairs Committee with 42 pages of amendments to Bill C53 (see TBP, June) an hour before clause by clause debate on the proposed amendments to the sexual offences section of the Code was to begin.

When he learned that a Moral Majority-style letter-writing campaign was responsible for the government's reversal, NDP justice critic Svend Robinson said that it threatened to turn the Criminal Code as it applied to sex acts "into a law-and-order nightmare." The Ottawa Citizen reported June 19 that the government has received "hundreds of petitions and thousands of letters," mostly from Ontario, British Columbia and Saskatchewan, and identified the 10,000-member US-based Family and Freedom Foundation, from Niagara Falls (Ontario and New York), as the single greatest influence on the volume of mail. The organization, led by Reverend Ron Marr, publishes The Christian Enquirer. It collected 5,000 names on one petition that was presented to the House of Commons by Progressive Conservative MP Walter Dinsdale.

According to Justice Ministry spokesperson Jacques Demers the government changed its mind about bestiality, buggery and group sex "to ensure it (C53) doesn't get bogged down in any prolonged emotional debate on morality issues which would result in the bill dying on the order paper and denying new safeguards for women and children."

Family and Freedom's Ron Marr: wants to keep laws on bestiality, buggery, group sex

Robinson believes Family and Freedom asked individuals to send reply cards to members of parliament and circulate petitions in their churches — much the way it did in 1980 during a successful right-wing campaign involving the Toronto Board of Education (see TBP, October 1980). He says "the Liberals have caved in to that very powerful and influential lobby (the US Moral Majority)."

More recently, the right-wing Positive Parents of Canada created a minor furor June 17 when their "man in Ottawa" gained entry to certain restricted areas in the House of Commons. He disseminated what even the Toronto Sun called "hate literature" of an unspecified nature to MPs' mail boxes and throughout the press benches just above Speaker Jeanne Sauvé's throne.

Stew Newton, who heads Positive Parents, said the material denounced Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau's "involvement with Moscow" and the proposed revisions of the Criminal Code.

The same day, Progressive Conservative MP Geoff Scott presented a petition in the House of Commons demanding that group sex be kept as an offence. Containing 200 names, it was prompted by last year's police raid on the swingers' tent near Hamilton, Ontario, and was initiated by the Free Reform Church of West Flamboro.

Before Chrétien proposed his amendments, several gay organizations had called for liberalization of the Code, including repeal of the bawdy house laws. L'Association pour les droits des gais et lesbiennes du Québec (ADGLQ — the Quebec association for lesbian and gay rights) and Toronto's Right to Privacy Committee (RTPC) both presented delegations to the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee on May 25 and April 29 respectively. The RTPC also placed a full-page ad in the June 2 national edition of The Globe and Mail calling for repeal of the bawdyhouse laws and signed by over 1500 people.

The ADGLQ called for other reforms as well. These included repeal of age of consent provisions with a "massive increase in sex education programmes for the young," repeal of homosexuality as grounds for divorce, and removal of soliciting and gross indecency sections of the Code. As well, it urged the deletion of all sexual references in laws against assaults, that "sexual orientation" and "sex" be included in areas of protection under hate propaganda legislation, that entrapment by police officers be allowed as a defence for those accused of sexual offences, and that the intended increase from two years imprisonment to five for making or selling sexually explicit material depicting persons under age 16 be dropped. The ADGLQ brief, presented by members Ron Dayman, Marcel Pleau and Stuart Russell, received a mixed reaction from the justice committee. The recommendation which drew the most opposition was that urging the repeal of age-of-consent regulations.

The ADGLQ urged that coercion of sexual partners, despite their age, be the determining factor when prosecuting individuals, and that the laws dealing with this be outside the Criminal Code. At present, the government intends to lower the age of consent for homosexual acts from 21 years to 18, while retaining a heterosexual age of consent ranging from 14 to 16 years in most cases.

Both Robinson and Progressive Conservative Justice Critic Ray Hnatyshyn disagreed with the recommendation. Robinson felt that there should be a uniform age of consent for both homosexual and heterosexual acts, but that "your recommendations would allow for no protection whatsoever, as I see it, for children who are subjected to sexual abuse within the family unit or by persons in positions of authority over them." Hnatyshyn questioned whether young children have the capacity to consent to sexual activities. Although he admitted that age of consent laws are "arbitrary and difficult," he thought that removing them altogether would pose "greater difficulties."

On the subject of "kiddie porn," the delegation told legislators that they felt present provisions against production and distribution of obscene material were more than adequate, and that the government should actually be moving toward a decriminalization of such material. "If there is a social problem, it is not by making additional legislation that we are going to solve it," Dayman said.

Prostitution squeeze moves nation-wide

TORONTO — As complaints from the North Jarvis neighbourhood increase and this year's municipal elections loom, downtown politicians have begun vying for the public's attention on the issue of prostitution.

Ward 6 junior alderman John Sewell drew 125 people to the Church Street Community Centre May 27 for a public meeting which heard suggestions from residents that ranged from regulation through zoning to increased police foot patrols. Morality bureau sergeant Tommy Stephen told the audience to lobby MPs for stricter laws.

The Metro Toronto Police commission decided June 3 to increase foot patrols and to send a delegation to Ottawa to testify before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs June 10. Commissioners Jane Pepino and Dennis Flynn were joined by Ward 6 alderman Gordon Chong. That day Mayor Art Eggleton also sent a letter to the federal government.

Prostitution is legal in Canada. Being in a place that is resorted to for the purposes of prostitution (a bawdy house) is illegal. Soliciting is illegal, but only if it's "pressing or persistent," something that's difficult to prove in court.

Toronto politicians are just the most recent addition to what seems to be a national trend. From Halifax to Vancouver, citizens have been lobbying the federal government to tighten Criminal Code provisions against soliciting as municipal politicians try to placate their constituents who live in areas frequented by prostitutes.

Municipal bylaws in Vancouver, Niagara Falls and Winnipeg have either been instituted or planned since early May. Complaints have been received from Halifax, Ottawa and Toronto since then. Both Montreal and Calgary introduced bylaws restricting soliciting in 1980 and 1981 respectively. Montreal's bylaw was struck down by the Quebec Superior Court in December. Calgary's was upheld this spring and is now on its way to the Supreme

New charges on washroom beat

Two police officers charged a gay man with "lingering on TTC (Toronto Transit Commission) property without due cause" at 1:15 am June 9 when they decided he had overstayed his welcome in a subway restroom at Yonge and Bloor.

The accused, who faces a maximum fine of $500 if convicted, says he left the Quest, a Yonge St gay bar, at 1:00 am, walked to the subway where he entered the washroom, urinated, then walked to a wall to lean for a second or two. "I'd only been standing there about 30 seconds when the police came in," he said.

Another man who had been standing in the washroom was also taken away by the police, according to the accused.

The charge is based on a TTC bylaw and is not a Criminal Code offence. The man's lawyer, Harvey Hamburg, thinks the police have "just cottoned on to the possibility of using this charge" to harass people in the washrooms even if they aren't having sex."

The accused attributes the charge to the "Let's-get-the-queers-with-whatever-we-can" attitude of some police officers. "I'm very annoyed about the whole thing because the inference is that I was doing something more than lingering." DC □

Three men were arrested and charged with committing indecent acts following a raid on a men's washroom at Concordia University in Montreal.

According to one of the accused, the men's room was locked from the outside by a security guard after he allegedly observed the indecent acts. The guard called the Montreal police, who unlocked the room and arrested all three men.

Two of the men pleaded guilty at a preliminary hearing May 15, and were convicted and given small fines. The trial of the third person, who pleaded not guilty, has been remanded to September.

The episode has caused serious concern and alarm among Concordia students and faculty, hundreds of whom use the men's room daily. The toilet, located in the Norris Building on the downtown Sir George Williams campus, is the only public facility in the building.

Several faculty members charged the university with serious misconduct in its handling of the affair. They argued that security guards should simply ask offenders to leave the building and call police only if the request is refused. □

Not a Love Story and the anti-porn crusade

Five members of a recently formed Toronto group called Pornography Oppresses Women (POW) were roughed up June 4 by employees of the Zanzibar Tavern, a strip joint on Yonge Street. They had been busy taking photographs of patrons' comings and goings, their press release explained, "to make each man accountable for contributing to the exploitation of and violence against women." The police were called as a result of the scuffle with bouncers, but they declined to lay charges because they said the two sides of the account varied too widely. In response POW organized a demonstration to take place outside the Zanzibar June 12. And for the first time in recent memory I found myself assigned to cover a demonstration for which I had almost no sympathy.

I share the protestors' rage at the treatment of the women both by the bouncers and the police. But for the organizers, there was no distinction to be made between the violence suffered by POW members and the group's original target: pornography. For me, their tactics — the attempted use of guilt to modify someone's sexual behaviour — left a very bad taste.

The same day that 200 feminists picketed the Zanzibar Tavern in Toronto, the National Film Board's controversial film Not A Love Story: a film about pornography was opening on 57th Street in New York, just blocks away from where much of the footage of the cinematographic indictment had been shot. I finally saw the film myself a few days later, when I participated in a panel discussion about film censorship.

Robert Fulford, writing in the June 5 Toronto Star, credited the film with inspiring 500 women and men to march with the Feminist Coalition Against Pornography in Montreal two weeks before. He also said that he knew of no woman reviewer who was critical of the film. After taking a look back at the whole issue, I've decided I'd love to be the first.

Not A Love Story tells a morality tale, using the perceptions of former stripper Linda Lee Tracy as its vehicle. Tracy opens the film with a challenge to filmmaker Bonny Klein that feminists, like men, think that strippers are exploited and too dumb to know it. The film ends with her tearful confession of relief that "at least I can feel sick" about sexual objectification.

Film also objectifies: it takes pieces of life out of their real context and preserves them on celluloid. The funny thing about this film, though, is that not all the characters are objectified equally. Some people seem to be looking more than they are being looked at, while others are being looked at more than they are looking. Those who do the looking sit in bright, airy, greenery-filled frames and deliver carefully measured and sensitive insights. The people who are mostly looked at inhabit dingy photo studios, peep shows, strip joints and the like. Confronted by the camera they react, often defensively and with growing bitterness, their own lives their only authority.

Despite its pretence to be a documentary, the film has an anti-science bias. In the first few minutes, it dismisses any investigation of the role of fantasy in porn and never again deals with the contradictions and distinctions that always exist between image and reality.

By assuming that all porn, and all sexuality, is heterosexual, Not A Love Story glosses over the rich complexity of human sexuality and misses potential avenues of exploration. Gay male porn obviously doesn't exploit women, but does it exploit men? In the same way? If so, how? If not, why not?

Film that blunders into the territory of sexual behaviour cannot safely dismiss sexual minorities, precisely because they are the least understood and most vulnerable to pressure from the ill-informed. Could it be that the filmmakers had no opportunity for such a digression? How, with well-known radical lesbian Robin Morgan and equally well-known radical fairy Kenneth Pitchford both interviewed, could that have been so? And how was it the two of them turned up incarnated as a sensitive, liberal, nuclear family complete with offspring — in a state of grace and threatened by the eroding evil of pornography?

Gay people aren't the only sexual minority who might be affected by this discussion or by anti-porn actions like the one at the Zanzibar. As the moral clean-up-the-streets crusade grows, its most obvious targets in this city are prostitutes.

Sex and violence each conjure up powerful emotions and images, and the camera wades in, bent on imposing its own definitions. Images progress from tame to hard core (well, sort of) to occasional gory. An expert in a laboratory talks about men with uncontrollable appetites seeking ever more evil thrills, losing their grip on reality and perpetrating violent crimes against women and children. Not A Love Story does for pornography what Reefer Madness did for marijuana.

This film is dangerous not only because it is less honest, thorough, complete or sophisticated than it should be. It is also dangerous because it is bad feminism.

Despite Kate Millett's lone plea for more authentic sexual images, the filmmakers seem to have misplaced the feminist criticism that our society is sex-negative. In the past feminists have argued that twisted images of sexuality may well result from the suppression and distortion of sexual desire. In asserting that sex ought to be an aspect of life like any other, feminists have said that a sexual assault is a crime because it is an assault and not because it is sexual. Shouldn't it follow that the exploitation and degradation of the hooker or the stripper is not qualitatively different from that of the migrant worker, the secretary, the welfare mother, the factory worker or the mental patient?

Not A Love Story bemoans women's silent complicity with pornography without asking whether it really is all women who have averted their eyes from the billboards and magazine racks and have remained ignorant of the evil — or the delight — to be found in pornography. Not that many are going to admit to finding delight while, during the New York premiere of Not A Love Story, Gloria Steinem blithely compares women who read porn to Jews who read Nazi propaganda.

Nowhere does the film try to locate violence against women in the context of other injustices women face. As hands are wrung and tears are shed, all that is offered is Woman as Victim. Despair may be an inevitable response, if you are convinced that men are violent toward women simply because they are men — bound to some property of the Y chromosome, perhaps. If the film had seen men as agents of violence against women in a social system that is a haphazard hierarchy of interlocking and overlapping power relationships, a system in which gender is an important (but not the only) factor (class, race and sexual orientation being others), and in which violence is a symptom not to be mistaken for the disease itself, it would not have ended up with such strange bedfellows.

Canadians for Decency, a certifiable member of the anti-gay and anti-feminist right, is thanked in the credits of Not A Love Story. As are the boys from Operation P, the anti-porn squad that engineered the first raid on TBP. A sad testimony to just how radical feminism can be.

I was surprised to find out a while ago that Emma Goldman (whose radicalism is above reproach) didn't consider herself a feminist and in fact distrusted feminism for its middle-class base and its narrow, conservative outlook. She had a somewhat more down-to-earth approach to her sisters in the sex industry. She advocated free love and tried to organize prostitutes' unions.

There's a lesson in there somewhere.

POW on Toronto's Yonge Street: attempting to use guilt to modify people's sexual behaviour

Court of Canada.

Virtually all of the angry citizens' groups across the country have said they're not anti-prostitution, they just don't want it happening on their front lawns. At the Toronto meeting organized by Sewell, whenever anyone advocated the legalization of prostitution, morality officers protested that prostitution was already legal. They neglected to mention that being in a bawdy house, even if it's your private home, is not. Crown attorney Ed Geller told the meeting that zoning wouldn't work because johns wouldn't travel to industrial districts for sex, they'd rather do it on your lawn.

The government has been asked to repeal the bawdy house laws by feminist organizations concerned about prostitution as well as by gay organizations concerned about the baths. But with the government's final amendments to Bill C53, the current revision of sexual offences in the Criminal Code, it is clear they won't. It remains to be seen whether or not they will give the police the new laws they seek to bust prostitutes on the street.

Tent sex ruled bawdy, judge convicts duo

HAMILTON — Practitioners of circumstantial sex suffered a set-back with the June 10 conviction of Edward and Jeanette Hughes on charges of keeping a common bawdyhouse. The Hughes' operated a "swingers" club in a camp-ground tent 24 miles from Hamilton, which was raided last June by a bus-load of 50 police. A total of 303 charges were laid against 90 individuals.

Provincial Court Judge Peter Mitchell ruled that the activities observed by police during an undercover investigation constituted indecent acts, and thus the tent could be considered a common bawdyhouse. The acts in question, according to police testimony, were exclusively heterosexual, with no suggestion of leather or sex toys.

While noting that "Canada is relatively mature in its sexual attitudes," Judge Mitchell told the court that "The acts described would not be tolerated by the contemporary Canadian community. (Canadians) would expect the authorities to eliminate them if they were aware of them."

Judge Mitchell was clearly unconvinced by the evidence of all three expert witnesses for the defence, who had testified that the activities which took place were within the community's standard of tolerance.

Gene McBurney, counsel for the Hughes', reported that they intend to appeal the decision. "We were disappointed with the outcome," said McBurney, "but the judgment only applies to this particular set of facts. It's not a blanket decision on group sex."

The Hughes' are expected to be sentenced on June 22, and will probably be fined. Under Section 169 of the Criminal Code, however, they could face a maximum penalty of 2 years imprisonment and an unlimited fine.

The Hughes' are currently running another singles club in a house in the Hamilton area. According to McBurney, procedures have been altered somewhat and greater attempts are being made to make the club more private, and thus less open to prosecution.

First Pisces appeal is won by found-in EDMONTON — One of the men charged as a found-in in last year's police raid on the Pisces Sauna has successfully appealed his conviction, the first of a number of found-in appeals to receive judgment.

Court of Queen's Bench Judge Michael O'Byrne overturned the conviction against Randy Lysolirka June 15.

giving him a conditional discharge to become absolute after one year. O'Byrne also ordered the Crown to repay Lysohirka's $250 fine. However, the Crown may appeal the decision.

Another found-in, Jaime Carvalho, is still awaiting a ruling on his March 19 appeal before Queen's Bench Judge WJ Girgulic. Privacy Defence Committee chairman Michael Phair told TBP he is expecting a positive verdict, since the appeal judge expressed concern over the manner in which lower court judge Hyde conducted Carvalho's July 1981 trial. Hyde won instant notoriety in the gay community for his openly homophobic remarks during the trial. On one occasion, said Phair, he actually pointed to a group of gay people in the courtroom and shouted, "You're all criminals, all of you!"

New bath trials tally: fresh air, more wins

TORONTO — A large window in Old City Hall Courtroom 32 blew open June 14, refreshing the court with a strong summer gust. The court got an added gust of fresh air when defence counsel, former Ombudsman and one of Canada's top criminal lawyers, Arthur O Maloney, started questioning PC Delaney, an undercover officer involved in a nine-month surveillance of the International Steam Bath. On trial for keeping a common bawdy house were an employee and the owner of the bath.

Maloney's questioning of the officer explored the reason behind the prolonged investigation. Did the officer, Maloney asked, think his investigation was a proper use of his professional ability? Why had he gone into the bath? Had anyone been robbed? And who had given the officer his orders?

A witness replied that Sgt Gary Carter of Police Intelligence had instructed him. The Crown jumped up and tried to shut the window Maloney had opened.

Who gave Carter his instructions? Witness did not know. Did the officer think his visits to the bath a proper use of the taxpayers' money? When Crown objected to this, Kerr asked counsel not to make a political speech. "The officer was only doing his duty," he said.

The trial continues June 22.

Found-ins have been trekking almost daily into court only to have the charges against them withdrawn. On May 21, nine found-ins in College Park Court appeared and had their charges withdrawn.

Those parachuted into Scarborough's Courtroom 405 by Chief Associate Judge H Rice continue to fare well. Found-ins are calling the judge's decision to try them outside of Toronto their "Charter of Rice." Most charges are being withdrawn.

A Romans II found-in sentenced to 60 hours of community service work by Judge RB Dnieper in April won his appeal against the sentence before County Court Judge Joseph Sheard May 27. He was granted an absolute discharge.

A notable setback for a found-in occurred in 405 June 8, when a wavering lawyer held up the start of her client's trial while she argued him into reversing his plea of not guilty. The Right to Privacy Committee (RTPC) continues to advise found-ins to plead not guilty. □

COMMUNITY PROFILE

Community centre: not just a building

In 1977 the Gay Community Centre of Saskatoon operated out of a former typing school in a neglected downtown office building. Below it was the Indian-Metis Friendship Centre. Five years later, in March 1982, the centre lost its most recent home at 245 Third Avenue South, when the landlord padlocked the entrance.

Somewhere in the intervening years, a great deal of hope and enthusiasm went astray. Gone are those incredibly concentrated years following the 1977 National Conference when anything seemed possible and was. From Sunday community dinners, to the cable television committee, the centre cultivated a host of ideas. Cohesiveness helped get things done. The city has grown. The dilapidated typing school on 20th has been replaced by a new office building. The Indian-Metis Friendship Centre has moved into modern facilities.

Throughout the downtown, older buildings are being pulled down or renovated to make room for new businesses. In their haste, many developers are pushing out low income tenants. Bag ladies, pensioners, and shoe-string social service agencies are the first to go. The GCCS was a victim of such growth.

The centre's pioneering work has paid off in some ways, despite the loss of the building. Urban growth has brought about a bevy of new gay people with broader interests, a sensitivity to self-oppression and, for some, greater expectations. This new group is more conservative and complacent than those who had the fundamentalist spirit of the earlier years. Life is comfortable. They haven't been threatened by anything as catastrophic as a bath raid, police brutality, or the invasion of private residences.

Another factor that hurried the demise of the centre was the widening of a long-standing rift between the social

Centre directors: Marion Alexander, DJ Villeneuve, Brenda Vallilee, Antonia Botting, John Goodwin, John Harlekin and their former home

and the political crowds. Many people who were only interested in a comfortable place to drink a beer or read a book felt unwanted in the community centre. Revenue fell off, stipends to the Gay Academic Union, the centre library and the Saskatchewan Gay Coalition were quickly axed, and before long the rent wasn't being paid.

But the Gay Community Centre is more than a building, and the group has carried on as have other community projects.

Following the centre's closing, the Saskatchewan Gay Coalition was forced to become financially independent, drawing more of its resources from the large rural area it serves. Metamorphosis, an annual lesbian/gay fair held in October, was also forced to become financially viable.

The vacuum created by the loss of the many functions the centre once housed has had a catalytic effect on some of the old community stalwarts. People who had left because of other interests, personality conflicts, or from simple "burn out" have been jarred into action.

An organization called Gay and Lesbian Support Services began providing peer counselling and suddenly became prominent in the community. The lesbian community, faced with no alternative to the community centre, fell back on its knack for having a gregarious good time, and began organizing well-attended monthly dances at the Hungarian Community Hall. The Quinlan Sisters have been received in the larger community with much enthusiasm.

A gay and lesbian workshop was held at the recent Canadian Library Association conference in Saskatoon. At the workshop, a bibliography, prepared in Saskatoon, of over 200 titles of gay and lesbian fiction and non-fiction was presented.

The future is not bleak. The GCCS continues to hold a number of dances each month. The newsletter has been jazzed up with a new layout and a bit of humour. The centre's board has adopted a two to three year plan to re-establish a community meeting place. The plan is gauged to allow time to pay off debts, save money and properly assess community needs. A great deal of time will be devoted to reaching out and mending some of the rifts.

Gay and Lesbian Support Services continues to expand its activities. It offers regular counselling, a telephone message of community happenings called GAYLINE, and has been organizing things as diverse as a softball team and a gay men's support group. GLSS is also presently looking after the centre's library. After some initially difficult meetings, the two groups have decided to cooperate. Gay and Lesbian Support Services seeks to provide organizational skills and counselling services. The Gay Community Centre will continue providing alternative social functions, political action and education.

Government stalls RCMP reforms

OTTAWA — Solicitor-General Robert Kaplan, the federal minister responsible for the RCMP, announced recently that long-awaited legislation establishing a civilian security agency would not be introduced during the current sitting of parliament. He cited parliament's heavy workload and government preoccupation with the country's floundering economy as reasons for the delay.

Replacement of the disgraced security arm of the RCMP by a new civilian agency was the principal recommendation of the McDonald Commission's report on RCMP wrongdoing, made public nine months ago. The report, of which several chapters still have not been made public, rocked the country when it revealed the existence of an extensive system of political surveillance and widespread lawbreaking by the very people sworn to uphold the law.

The commission recommended destroying most of the 800,000 files maintained by the Mounties on individuals they considered possible threats to security. The RCMP has opened files on almost every homosexual it has come across, on the pretext that these people could become security risks if they came to occupy "sensitive" positions.

Despite Kaplan's promises of speedy action on the files, nothing has been done to date. The minister explains that the government has not yet devised a "file-destruction" policy. In other words, it hasn't yet decided which files to hang onto.

Softball fever moves to Calgary

CALGARY — A gay softball league has started up in this Western city. It hosted its first tournament June 13.

The Calgary league plays under an umbrella organization called Apollo Friends in Sports. It works closely with Gay Information and Resources Calgary.

Two teams have been formed so far this year. One, consisting of players under 27 years of age, is called the Chickens and the other, named the Hawks, accepts players over 27. With the exception of the recent tournament, games have been played without umpires. Jokes Apollo member Ron Smith, "Whoever can scream the loudest gets his own way."

The openly gay league has encountered no difficulties in obtaining playing field permits. The games, played at a Catholic schoolground, attract many gay spectators, as well as neighbourhood "redneck straights" who watch from across the street. "I sometimes wonder how they'll react, the way some of the 'girls' carry on," Smith said, "but they just laugh."

Dudes, 18 East face suspended licences

TORONTO — The squeezeplay on Toronto's gay bars is underway for the second summer in a row. But unlike last year, when Metro police were frequenting the bars and laying charges, pressure comes this time from the Liquor Licence Board of Ontario.

The board has threatened to suspend the liquor licences of both Dudes and 18 East. Both bars, in the wake of last summer's charges for "exceeding the licence capacity," have already been convicted and fined by the courts.

"It's double jeopardy," says an angry Dave Davies, an owner of 18 East. "First the courts fine you. Then the board comes along and threatens to suspend your liquor licence."

Roger Wilkes, an owner of Dudes, is irate over an official liquor board investigator's report which, dormant since it

Wilkes told TBP that the investigator made comments on Dudes' clientele and decor which have no place in an official board document. Investigator JD Brooks wrote that "the establishment is completely patronized by members of the 'gay' community and is known as a 'gay' bar." He observed that the patrons "are only interested in drinking and listening to the disco type music." He took exception to the posters and community notices displayed in the bar, and judged that "disco type tapes" being played "were not consistent to good dinner music."

Both Dudes and 18 East have demanded hearings before the board to protest the threatened suspensions. "Everything Brooks observed has been approved by the board since we were first licenced in June 1978," Wilkes says, "and at regular intervals since then."

ORGANIZING

Psychiatrists debate status of caucus

TORONTO — The Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Caucus of the American Psychiatric Association became the focus of heated debate at the APA annual meeting held here May 15-21.

At issue was the caucus' application for official minority status in the association. Although this would mean only one official assembly representative, it would be seen as a moral victory. There are already a number of representatives from minority and under-represented groups in the assembly (women, and a number of racial and ethnic groups).

Up to this point, the caucus has received official support for its meetings, but has never been granted an official voice through representation in the assembly. Caucus members also feel that the APA should recognize gays and lesbians as a legitimate sexual minority, given that the APA decided in 1973 that homosexuality is not a disease per se.

Due to the amount of dissent on the issue, however, it was decided that delegates would return to their local districts for further debate.

Editor calls for halt to lesbian ad debate

ABBOTSFORD — The Abbotsford, Sumas and Matsqui News has politely asked their readers to put a lid on discussions relating to that paper's decision to continue running an advertisement for a lesbian drop-in centre.

The controversy over the ad "degenerated into an argument of biblical interpretation and the liberalization of sexual mores in a community (a small town of 10,000 people in British Columbia) that is traditionally conservative," according to an editorial in the June 2 issue of the weekly paper.

The editorial went on to say that The News would not give in to pressure to cancel the ad and that it "considers as a prime responsibility the provision of a forum for all its readers.... But there comes a time when even that forum, for the sake of the readers' interest, must be limited. Therefore... we ask that the issue of the lesbian drop-in centre advertisement be dropped." DC □

New rights group to stress activism

VANCOUVER — A new gay organization, the Gay Rights Union, was formed May 1. Spokesperson Richard Banner said the group will take an activist stance, stressing public action and education and incorporating feminist and trade unionist principles.

A primary objective will be to lobby for the addition of sexual orientation to the provincial human rights code. The group has already taken on Rob Joyce's discrimination case (see story page 8) and has received an endorsement from the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association.

The Union has a wide-ranging membership, including people who also belong to organizations such as the Vancouver Gay Community Centre News and Gayblevision. Banner said the group sees itself as complementing other organizations and intends to work with them in areas of common interest.

The Gay/Lesbian Electors Action Movement (GLEAM) has formed a pressure group to work in civic elections, polling candidates on gay issues and endorsing those who are gay positive.

GLEAM is currently engaged in a voter registration drive preparatory to the upcoming November civic elections. For more information, contact GLEAM c/o the Vancouver Gay Community Centre, 1244 Seymour St, Vancouver.

Dignity members meet in Edmonton

EDMONTON — More than 120 people attended the sixth annual Dignity/Canada Dignité conference "Free to Be" held in Edmonton May 21-24. Dignity/Edmonton member Kevin Simpson reported the conference was a success, citing in particular the ecumenical spirit of the weekend with a number of non-Catholics attending, and two protestant ministers leading workshops.

Highlights of the conference were an address by Father Giles Hibbert from England on "Sexual Ethics and Freedom to Be," and a large concelebrated mass, again with non-Catholic participation. A Sunday night dance attracted several hundred gays from the Edmonton community, as well as conference participants. RT

ALERT

Lessons of violence: prevent it, report it

TORONTO — A man's life may have been saved one night only because he did not live alone.

The man, who prefers to remain anonymous, picked up his assailant on Yonge Street near the Parkside Tavern late Saturday night, May 8.

At some point, the tone of the evening changed when the assailant smashed a marble trophy over his victim's head, tried to suffocate him with a pillow and strangle him. Screams for help brought his landlord to the rescue. "I'm still afraid; I can't sleep at times," he said.

The man did not contact his lawyers Harvey Hamburg and Paul Trollope, until Monday, two days later. They instructed him to obtain a medical report.

However, he then removed several objects from his apartment which would indicate that he is gay and attempted to hide this fact from police when they visited the following day. The two constables' questions forced the man to admit he had invited the assailant home. After this, he kept saying it was "my own fault for picking up this guy," and that "it was a dumb thing to do." The police simply agreed with him, and advised him to lay a complaint with a justice of the peace. The constables seemed to doubt the story, and neglected to take articles with the attacker's fingerprints.

Paul Trollope explained that the police don't see a story as credible unless it is reported immediately. "It is not normal for the police to do a fingerprint search under these circumstances. Such incidents are viewed in the same way as rape. If it is not reported instantly it's considered a doubtful complaint," he said.

Trollope further explained that once a complaint is filed with a justice of the peace and the evidence, such as a medical report, is accepted, a warrant is issued for the man's arrest. If the man is identified to the police, they are obligated to act on the warrant. In this case, however, a complaint had not been filed.

Although the man realizes that "it's everybody's responsibility," he reports that he's "had enough" and doesn't want the police to take any further interest in him.

A more common type of violence is the isolated attack against one man on the street. A recent example involves a man who had just left Dudes at approximately 1:20 Saturday morning (May 23), was surrounded by 4-5 men in the parking lot, one of whom swung around and hit him in the eye, forcing him to the ground.

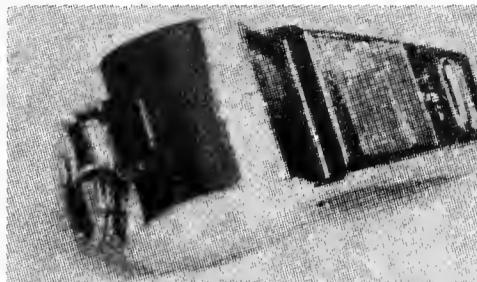

The incident was over in two minutes. Not once did the victim cry out for help. The man sought medical attention but did not report the attack to the police.

The Toronto Gay Patrol is concerned for the safety of lesbians and gay men on the street. It offers several suggestions to avoid violent situations. To begin with, know what is going on around you at all times. This may enable you to prevent problems by simply crossing the street, or running to the nearest open establishment. If caught by surprise, it is imperative not to remain quiet, but to get someone's attention by yelling, smashing a window or using a whistle. Finally, you must have the courage and stamina to fight back.

The most important thing to do after any such experience is to report it immediately to the police. After this you can contact the patrol and give them the details. If a victim would like to be accompanied in making a trip to a station to report an incident, this can be arranged through the patrol.

The patrol offers training classes every spring for those who can give a few hours a month to keep an eye on dangerous areas and keep a record of attacks, suspicious vehicles, and people in the area. Your help is needed. Call 928-3325, 488-2578, 961-8046 for more information.

Attacks in Ottawa parks increasing

OTTAWA — Gay men should be on the alert against violence once again this season as reports of assaults and robberies continue to mount. A gay man walking home to Ottawa from Hull June 3 was attacked and robbed by a gang of men in their 20's. The incident occurred on the Ottawa side of the interprovincial bridge near Nepean Point.

In mid-May, a Gays of Ottawa (GO) member was robbed and beaten while walking through Nepean Point Park late at night. Around the same time, another man phoned the Gayline to report a similar incident. GO INFO has also received two separate reports of violent robberies near the German embassy on the Rideau Canal.

Most of these attacks happen in similar circumstances. With robbery as a motive, and gay men as apparently easy targets, the gang of three to four men surrounds the victim, then attacks. (GO suspects this may be the same gang that caused many serious injuries last year at Strathcona Park.)

GO offers the following advice. Be alert. Should you be a victim or a witness to these attacks, report the incident to the police as soon as possible. As well, reporting details of such cases to the Gayline (231-1717) will help GO to monitor and thus better understand the nature of these attacks.

Cockettes founder Hibiscus dies in New York; 300 other cases reported

Kaposi research hurt by cutbacks

NEW YORK — Hibiscus, the drag and glitter rock star who co-founded the gender-fuck group the Cockettes in the early 70s died of Kaposi's Sarcoma and pneumocystis carinii pneumonia at Saint Vincent's Hospital May 8. He was 32 years old.

Hibiscus, born George Harris, first became ill a year ago. His condition deteriorated rapidly and he was admitted to hospital 10 days before his death. Jim Fouratt, a long-time friend, visited Hibiscus a few days before his death and said the decay was shocking. "No one wants to acknowledge that there is an epidemic in the gay community," he said. "It's just horrible to have to recognize this as a fact."

A Congressional hearing into the so-called Acquired Immunodeficiency Syndrome (AIDS) in the gay community was held at the Los Angeles Gay and Lesbian Community Services Center April 13. Cases of the rare and often fatal Kaposi's Sarcoma have been surfacing at a rate of one a day since May 1981. Of the 300 cases reported across the US, 242 are homosexual or bisexual men, 30 are heterosexual and 18 are of unknown sexual preference.

According to Dr Lawrence Mass, writing in the New York Native, studies indicate that the presence of immunodeficiency may be more prevalent than suspected. One study of 100 sexually active, ostensibly healthy gay male volunteers found that 80 to 85% had persistent (but not progressive) evidence of immunodeficiency. "My hunch is that most of these patients will not go on to develop the full immunodeficiency syndrome," said Dr Frederick Siegal, a contributor to the New England Journal of Medicine. "If we're wrong on the other hand, it would be a catastrophe."

Studies are continuing across the United States but are being hampered by the Reagan administration's budget cuts. The Federal Centers for Disease Control have lost 30% of their real funding over the last two years.

"I want to be especially blunt about the political aspects of Kaposi's Sarcoma," said Congressman Henry A Waxman, who chaired the Los Angeles hearings. "This horrible disease afflicts members of one of the nation's most stigmatized and discriminated against minorities. The victims are not typical main-street Americans. They are gays, mainly from New York, Los Angeles and San Francisco."

"Legionnaires disease hit a group of predominantly white, heterosexual middle-aged members of the American Legion. The respectability of the victims brought them a degree of attention and funding for research and treatment far greater than that made available so far to victims of Kaposi's Sarcoma. I want to emphasize the contrast because the 'more popular' Legionnaires disease affects fewer people (and proved less likely to be fatal). What society judged was not the severity of the disease but the social acceptability of the individuals afflicted with it." □

Studies "improve" shock therapy threat

SUNNYVALE, CA — The Lesbian and Gay Associated Engineers and Scientists (LGAES) has issued an alert about new anti-gay research.

Doctors GC Abel of Columbia University and EB Blanchard and DH Barlow of the State University of New York are attempting to improve aversion therapy techniques. Subjects, frequently minors forced by parents or guardians, are shown erotic pictures while a penile plethysmograph records their response. A response to homoerotic images produces an electric shock.

Many gay men have in the past been able to pretend the "treatment" was working in order to escape further electric shocks, but the new research is aimed at making it impossible for subjects to fake a response and possible to determine sexual orientation against the subject's will.

Meanwhile a report by the American Medical Association (AMA) Council of Scientific Affairs entitled "Health Care Needs of an Underserved Population" asserts that gays can be "cured" and that promiscuity is pathological. The report goes on to say that politics was responsible for the removal of homosexuality from the American Psychiatric Association's list of Mental disorders in 1973. □

UN rights committee lets Finns off hook

HELSINKI — A majority of the members of the United Nations Human Rights Committee has decided that it cannot intervene in the case of complaints laid against the Finnish government by that country's leading gay organization, SETA.

SETA claimed that Finnish law prohibiting the "encouragement" of homosexuality violates Article 19 of the United Nations International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights which guarantees freedom of expression. Although homosexuality itself is not illegal in Finland, encouraging such behaviour is a criminal offence. SETA's complaint pointed out that a number of Finnish Broadcasting Company programmes had been censored because of the law.

The UN committee decided that, although censorship had taken place, it could not take a stand on the government's action without being familiar with the full text of the censored programmes. The UN Covenant permits censorship under certain conditions.

SETA took the case to the UN more than three years ago, but the Finnish government managed to hold up the process by disputing the admissibility of the complaint. □

French Senate vote delays consent bill

PARIS — The French Senate is attempting to block passage of a reform bill equalizing the age of consent for homosexual and heterosexual acts. The National Assembly's Socialist majority had passed the bill earlier this year.

After a debate May 5, the Senate voted 189 to 108 against the repeal of the section of the French criminal code which sets 18 as the minimum age for gay sex. The law was passed during the German occupation of France in World War II. The age of consent for heterosexuals is 15.

The Senate's vote is seen as a political move to embarrass the Socialist government of François Mitterrand. However, Raymond Forni, Socialist president of the National Assembly's Law Commission, has vowed that law reform will take place, with or without Senate approval. "This government keeps its promises," he said. □

Israeli group starts first Hebrew gay mag

HAIFA — The Israeli gay liberation organization, the Society for the Preservation of Personal Rights (SPPR), has begun publication of the country's first gay liberation magazine.

Native Nossaf (Another Way) is printed in Hebrew with a quarter page in English. It can be reached at Box 45417, 31453 Haifa, Israel.

The SPPR has also opened a gay phone line in Tel Aviv, offering counseling and tourist information. □

Frisco police drop libel suit against BAR

SAN FRANCISCO — The San Francisco Police Officers' Association (SFPOA) has dropped a $5 million suit against a local gay community newspaper, the Bay Area Reporter.

The suit alleged that BAR had libelled the SF Police Department in reports about police brutality following the 1979 Dan White verdict riots. However, it has been dismissed twice by California courts on the grounds of "lack of cause of action."

"We said when the case was first filed that it was an attempt to intimidate the people of San Francisco from speaking out against police brutality," said American Civil Liberties Union staff counsel Amitai Schwartz. "We can now confirm that this police libel suit was a case of harassment plain and simple against the Bay Area Reporter.... Apparently the police got all the mileage

Feminists split on "correct" sex

NEW YORK — The ninth annual conference of The Scholar and the Feminist, organized around the theme "Towards a Politics of Sexuality," has underscored deep divisions in the women's movement around questions of sexuality.

The conference, held at the Women's Centre at Barnard College April 24, was "to address women's sexual autonomy, choice and pleasure, acknowledging that sexuality is simultaneously a domain of restriction, repression and danger as well as exploration, pleasure and agency." Much of the discussion took place between feminists who regard sex as the proper expression of a revised, more egalitarian love relationship, and those who consider it from the perspective of personal pleasure and object to the concept of any "politically correct" sexuality.

The extent to which feminists are polarized on the sexuality issue was made clear in the position taken by the Coalition for a Feminist Sexuality and Against Sadomasochism, a group which includes Women Against Violence Against Women, Women Against Pornography and the New York Radical Feminists. Referring to an "anti-feminist backlash," the coalition denounced the participation of women who "support and practise pornography, promote sex roles and sadomasochism and have joined the straight and gay pedophile organizations in lobbying for an end to laws that protect children from sexual abuse by adults."

Their opponents replied by circulating a petition that concludes, "With their insistence that they already know what feminists should think about sex — that anyone who disagrees must be purged from the movement — the Coalition repudiates the spirit of free inquiry and the basic principles of a democratic radical movement. If anything, it is their authoritarianism, fear of difference, and lack of principle that deserves the label 'backlash.'" □

NAMBLA member fights stiff sentence

BALTIMORE — North American Man Boy Love Association member Ray Latham is facing 16 years in prison for "associating" with a 15-year-old boy.

Latham was convicted of consensual sexual activity with two 12-year-olds in 1977, but was paroled on the provisions that he not associate with males under the age of 18, that he report to a therapist regularly and that he take the so-called chemical castration agent, Deprovera.

Latham was arrested again in 1981 for violating his parole provision when police found that a 15-year-old boy was living at his home. The boy had been placed in Latham's care by his mother because she was unable to cope with his school and family problems. The boy's behaviour and school work had improved after living with Latham and his 13-year-old daughter. Police examined the boy and found that no sex had taken place. Latham has complied with all other parole provisions.

At a May 10 post-conviction hearing, Latham's lawyers argued that the provision prohibiting the association with a whole class of individuals was unconstitutional. Judge Andrea Melbourne has deferred her decision until mid-June.

"My constitutional rights have clearly been violated," Latham said. "No sex with this boy has been alleged, yet I will probably die of old age in prison because I housed and helped find schooling for a teenaged boy. This is a death sentence." Latham is 67 years old. □

Jerry Falwell faces Australian protests

SYDNEY — More than 500 demonstrators protested the arrival of Moral Majority leader Jerry Falwell in this city May 23, far outnumbering the faithful who came to hear the anti-gay preacher.

Demonstrators taunted and jeered members of the Accelerated Christian Education Group and the Word of Life who organized the service. The crowd cheered as the Sisters of Perpetual Indulgence exorcised the building and a speaker from the Student Christian movement pointed out the hypocrisy of the Moral Majority's "pro-life" stand on abortion coupled with support for the construction of the neutron bomb.

Falwell also faced demonstrators in Canberra when he spoke to the National Press Club a few days earlier. Forty people had to be removed from the club during his speech.

Most galling to the right-wing Christians who brought Falwell to Australia was the fact that gay groups in different Australian states have registered the name "Moral Majority" and have produced stickers, badges and T-shirts with such slogans as "Moral Majority Loves

Chilean police force steps up repression

SANTIAGO — The Chilean police have recently stepped up harassment of gay people with raids on gay nightspots.

A new gay club which opened in Santiago April 2 was raided by police the same night. More than 200 people were detained for 24 hours and their names and addresses are now on police files. A week earlier a similar raid took place on another bar frequented by gay people.

Anti-gay repression has increased dramatically in Chile since the 1973 right-wing coup. A gay Chilean refugee described his experience in testimony to the International Gay Association last year:

"I was arrested because I was assumed to be a homosexual. I was brought to a concentration camp. The military personnel who interrogated me did not have proof of my homosexuality and they could not cite a single witness. They tried to make me say I was a homosexual under torture. I did not say anything because if I had they would have killed me immediately. That is what has happened to all avowed homosexuals in Chile. It is impossible to resist because homosexuals in Chile are terrorized and they constantly deny their homosexuality because they are afraid of dying." □

Police raid clubs in Tampa and Boston

TAMPA, FL — Seventy-three men were arrested in a police raid on the Club Tampa the evening of Wednesday, May 12. Club Tampa is a member of the Club Bath chain.

Police said the raid was the result of a complaint. Three employees of the bath were charged with "keeping a house of ill fame," while bath patrons were booked on various misdemeanor charges.

Club Tampa manager Peter Esfakis offered to assume all legal fees for arrested club members. "I want our customers to know that they're safe at Club Tampa," he said.

The bath was closed for a day and a half after the raid and reopened minus the "family room." There has been little press coverage of the incident.

The charge of "keeping a house of ill fame" was laid against a Boston gay club, the Loft 21, May 9. The club owners were also charged on several counts each of selling soft drinks without a license, overcrowding, selling alcoholic beverages without a license, and holding an "unlicensed Sunday exhibition."

Boston media treated the story as major news and reported a "porno, sex and drug raid" on a room "in which males watched pornographic videotapes and performed sexual acts under a palm tree." However, police laid no sex or porno charges.

Judge John A Pino rapped police and media at the club's first court appearance. "I read about this in the newspaper with my morning coffee," said Judge Pino. "I read about pornography implications.... But what have I got here for complaints? Selling soft drinks without a license... overcrowding... unlicensed Sunday exhibition. Where are the other charges?" □

British city passes "buggers' charter"

NOTTINGHAM, UK — Nottinghamshire County Council has passed a resolution to protect its employees against discrimination on the basis of "race, colour, nationality, ethnic or national origin, creed, sex, marital status or sexual orientation." The resolution, introduced by the council's Labour Party members, outraged Conservative councillors, but was carried by the Labour majority.

One councillor protested, "If this means what I think it means, human morals will be debased to the lowest possible level." Another Conservative councillor christened the resolution a "buggers' charter."

The council's strong pro-gay stance was the result of several years' work by Nottingham gays. "This is an excellent example of how similar results can be achieved through the political party structure, especially the Labour Party," said Ted McFadyen of Gay Rights at Work. □

Indonesian lesbian faces jail, therapy

JAKARTA — An Indonesian lesbian has been sentenced to eight months in prison for committing indecent acts with her lover.

Aty, a singer in a band in Jakarta, ran away with her 15-year-old lover Nona last year. The pair was subsequently arrested in Bali.

Defence lawyers argued that the women were not guilty of a crime because they had psychological problems. Press coverage of the trial also viewed lesbianism as a "mental illness."

According to the International Lesbian Information Service, Aty's family has subsequently found a doctor to "lessen her male hormones" either medically or surgically. □

Nebraska vote kills gay rights protection

LINCOLN, NEBRASKA — A proposed gay rights amendment to this city's human rights law was defeated by a wide margin May 10.

The amendment to add "sexual orientation" to the non-discrimination clause of the city charter had the backing of Lincoln Mayor, Helen Boosalis, four of seven city council members and three of the city's four representatives in the State legislature.

A group calling itself the Committee to Oppose Special Rights for Homosexuals played on stereotypes that gay people were child molesters and led sordid lifestyles. "I don't think they should be food handlers or handle blood," said Committee leader Paul Cameron, a Lincoln psychologist. "But in the arts I see no reason for them to be discriminated against."

Supporters of the amendment had expected to lose, but were surprised by the four to one margin of defeat. "I believe we achieved a victory in spite of the vote," said Cheryl Long, co-chair of the Lincoln Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Civil Rights. "We succeeded in bringing to the public's attention the fact that discrimination against us exists." □

Fighting the right — in church

WASHINGTON — Delegates from 17 gay Christian and interfaith groups met here May 7 to 9 to form the first national, interdenominational gay religious grouping in the United States.

The new group's primary objective is to respond to the increasing political power of the conservative Christian right. "If there is any group able to counter the religious right, it would be openly gay Christians," said Joe Izzo, conference coordinator. "The new right needs to be countered on a theological basis."

Delegates debated whether the group should be interfaith or restricted to Christian groups, but decided on the latter. The group also agreed that a third-world and a women's representative should be part of each delegation at a second conference to be held in Los Angeles in November. The Los Angeles conference will formally establish the new organization and work out its structure.

The following weekend, gay politics generated debate once again, as the Metropolitan Community Churches (MCC) applied for membership in the National Council of Churches (NCC), an umbrella group of 32 Christian denominations in the US. The NCC governing board, meeting in Nashville, Tennessee, rejected its membership committee's proposal to accept MCC immediately, and voted to put off the decision on MCC membership until the next NCC conference in San Francisco in May 1983. Council leaders fear that accepting MCC might result in more conservative churches leaving the NCC.

In another development, a United Methodist Church jurisdictional investigative committee has decided that Bishop Melvin E Wheatley of Denver did not violate doctrinal standards of church discipline by his statement, "I clearly do not believe homosexuality is a sin." The bishop made the statement last November after the appointment of the Reverend Judith Rush, an open homosexual, to a post at St Paul's United Methodist Church in Denver. A number of Georgia and Texas Methodist churches had accused the bishop of undermining "the authority of the Holy Scripture."

Ordination of an open lesbian as a minister in the United Church of Christ (UCC) has also sparked controversy. The Reverend Anne Holmes was ordained by the UCC at the Emmaus Church in a Washington DC suburb.

Emmaus minister Reverend Tom Cox said the decision to ordain Holmes had created tension and division within his congregation. "The pain had to do with the fact that families found themselves on opposite sides of the issue."

The UCC is one of the most liberal Protestant denominations. Ordination questions are decided by local parishes and associations. □

Dear TBP,

"A Challenge"

This letter may not reach you, so a reply of some sort to indicate it got through would be appreciated. But that's not the challenge.

This is: an in-depth study of what it is like to be Gay in prison.

It's not a subject that can be covered in a paragraph or even a column. There are deep-rooted problems, emotional and physical, to the issue. There is the question of the difference between the Gay and the "sweet kid." There is the question of harassment of the Gay by staff, as well as by other inmates. There is the suggestion by the administration that "open ranges" can't be allowed "because of the homosexuals," when in fact the problem is not the Gays, but the so-called "kids and dads" who are about as gay as I am straight.

There is the problem of survival. While "sweet kids" are acceptable, even desirable, don't be an open Gay. It's alright to be forced, bribed or looking for a defender in exchange for sex, but don't be willing and let it be known that you have been Gay on the street.

Many Gays, as well as straights, have no idea what has to be put up with in here if you're Gay. The challenge to you, and TBP, is to let them know.

I'd be willing to put my two cents in if the administration will let me, but I fear that you'll get blocked. They tend to turn a blind eye, to pretend the problem doesn't exist unless you get caught. I see more "couples" in here than at the St Charles Tavern. But as long as the homosexual can be used as a scapegoat, all's fair in love and sex in the showers.

Well, there's your challenge. A true exposé on what it's like to be Gay and in prison.

Good luck — you'll need it.

Warm regards,
Mac

Dear Mac,

Gerald Hannon has passed on to me the letter you wrote in December, in which you offer us the challenge of "an in-depth study of what it's like to be gay in prison."

The issues you mentioned are all of interest to us and are things we have wanted to cover for some time, but have never been able to make the right contacts to do so. Now we have a contact — you. The next thing is to decide exactly what you can do.

The thing you might be in the best position to do is something regular, like a column, where you can take each one of the issues you raised and deal with it at length. Most of us, for instance, don't know what a "sweet kid" is. We don't know about the kinds of arrangements prisoners make with each other for protection. We don't know how the administration reacts to any of this, let alone how someone who is gay by self-definition (and not by circumstance) reacts to it. I think you could tell us these things.

How about trying something like a regular "letter from prison" that we could publish every issue, or every other issue if that worked better. If this idea appeals to you, let me know — and if it doesn't, feel free to say what you think would work better. Then all that's left is to try writing something and we'll see how it goes.

So stick with it — and get back to me as soon as you can. Best wishes from all of us.

Sincerely,
Rick Bébét,

The Honourable Robert Kaplan
Solicitor-General of Canada
House of Commons, Ottawa

Sir:

I am presently serving a sentence of three (3) years, which commenced on 2 September 1981. My file indicates that I am a homosexual. I am not a practicing homosexual. I don't need the practice.

In December 1981, I contacted the national Gay newspaper, The Body Politic, and suggested that they do a series of articles on what it is like to be a Gay inmate in a prison environment. The Body Politic editorial collective wrote me in January suggesting that I, as a Gay inmate, write the articles.

In keeping with the rules and regulations concerning such matters, I requested permission from the Warden, via the Inmate Committee and my acting Classification Officer.

I was advised yesterday that my request for permission to write the articles was denied.

I was further advised that the main reasons for denial were:

a) To allow me to write the articles would be an admission that homosexuality exists in prisons, and to have any publication of this admission would, in effect, mean that the administration was condoning the activity.

b) To allow me to write articles of such a nature would possibly lead to a movement within and without the institution to allow homosexual activities to take place.

c) To allow me to write the articles would or could mean that an undue amount of emphasis on this type of behaviour would take place.

Mr Kaplan, in answer to all of the above comments, may I take the liberty of quoting your Leader, and our Prime Minister, when he said in the House of Commons:

"FUDGLE DUDDLE!"

The enclosed article, which is for your information and perusal, was to be the first of a series of articles. It does not, I do believe, portray this or any other institution as a "sin bin." It is not an exposé on homosexuality within the institution.

As stated in this article, my purpose is to reach other gay people and let them know what it is like for a person who is homosexual to do time, not what gay activities are going on or how much "fun" can be had. (If there is a lot of fun, I'm missing out on it.)

I am an open Gay. The administration may find that to be a difficult situation with which to contend. There are, to my knowledge, a number of inmates who are homosexual, and were even before they came here. Individually and collectively, we suffer certain recriminations and discriminatory actions by inmates and institution administration alike.

This is, unfortunately, not the first encounter I have had with the administration as a result of my assertion that I am entitled to treatment equal to that received by heterosexual inmates. Until yesterday, I was having mail addressed to me by a Gay pen-pal club returned. The administration considered such material to be indecent because it was homosexual in nature.

I am still trying to determine if the administration will pass such magazines as Blueboy, Mandate, Numbers and even The Body Politic. I am told that these may be found to be offensive and indecent. I am told that the fact that such publications are available in most bookstores is irrelevant. Homosexuality in here is considered to be indecent. A member of the administration promptly compared Gay literature to publications of the Ku Klux Klan.

I contend that the biased and prejudiced attitude of members of the administration interferes with their ability to rationally understand a situation that has been confronting them for years. I think that they honestly believe that if they play ostrich and hide their heads in the sand, the problem will go away. God forbid anybody should state that there are homosexual inmates in this institution, and God help the poor bastard who says it.

I have followed your career for years, Mr Kaplan, and have applauded your sense of fair play. It is for that reason that I have appealed directly to you.

Mr Kaplan, I respectfully request that you take the following action on my behalf.

a) That I be allowed to write the articles for The Body Politic, on the provision that I do not use my own name, identify the institution or identify any other inmates, and present all copy to a member of the Socialization and Development Office of this institution for review and censor prior to sending out for publication.

b) That I be allowed to receive copies, direct from the publisher, of Blueboy, Numbers, Mandate, In Touch, The Body Politic and The Advocate, all of which are available on newsstands and have not been considered to be obscene or indecent by any court, censoring body or Customs official.

c) That no action be taken by the administration of this institution as a result of my writing you or any other individual in an attempt to preserve my basic rights and freedoms and to protest any form of discrimination as a result of my sexual orientation.

Mr Kaplan, I respectfully submit this for your consideration, review and decision.

I await your reply.
Respectfully,
Mac M

The reasons the administration gave for saying no indicated that they did not understand the purpose of the articles in the first place. They seem to think it was to be an exposé on Gay sex in prisons rather than a detailed account of what it is like psychologically and emotionally for a person who is Gay to be in prison.

I have detailed all this in my letter to Kaplan, and wonder if you could support me by writing him as well. Perhaps you could send him a copy of my original letter to TBP. That might help.

Wish me luck with my appeal. The drafts that you get will be spelled better than this. I'm rushing to make today's mail pick-up. Regards to you all.

Dear Mr Kaplan,
I am writing to urge your assistance in the case of Mac M, a prisoner at _____ Penitentiary.

Mr M wrote to us in December 1981 offering to write about gay life in prison for our magazine. I am now informed that the prison administration has refused to allow Mr M to submit the material he had intended to us. He tells me that he has appealed this decision to you.

In his letter to me, Mr M noted that: "The reason the administration gave for saying no indicated that they did not understand the purpose of the articles in the first place." I think it should be clear, both from Mr M's original proposal to us and from our response to him, that neither he nor we have in mind sensational stories of gay sex in prison. The "situational homosexuality" that tends to occur in prisons has been well documented elsewhere, and is less an issue for us than the reactions and perceptions of a self-identified gay man thrust into this situation. Mac M is clearly an intelligent and articulate man, and is well placed to write about these things — things which, we feel, the rest of our community would do well to know more about.

I urge you to intervene with the administration on Mr M's behalf.

Sincerely,

Glory be! I not only received your letter and copy of the letter to Mr Kaplan, but I also got the copy of The Body Politic. Miracles never cease to amaze me.

I appreciate the comments in your letter to Mr K. They were very kind. I am sure that the copy of your letter that you sent me was passed around before I received it. So what. The administration has always been aware of what I was doing.

Congratulations on your decade of publishing. By the way, if any of my letters happen to end up in TBP, I'll most certainly forgive you.

Take care and keep up the good work for another ten years.

Dear Bob,

I have received a copy of a letter written to you by Mr Mac M, a prisoner at _____ Penitentiary.

I would like to take issue with the administration's response to Mr M's request for permission to write a series of articles for The Body Politic. By refusing him permission to do so, they are restricting Mr M's right to freedom of thought and expression on an issue no longer condemned by the Criminal Code. You will agree that the sexual orientation of individual Canadians is of no interest to the state. Neither is it the business of the prison administration to determine what kind of sexuality is appropriate for their prisoners so long as the practice or expression of it does not interfere with the "good order of the institution." Writing articles on the subject in no way poses such a threat.

I would be very interested in receiving both your comments on this subject and a copy of your reply to Mr M. I look forward to hearing from you in this regard.

March 1, 1982

Dear Mr Bébout,

I would like to thank you for your letter dated February 3, 1982, and enclosures concerning Mac M.

I am considering your letter and will reply soon.

Yours truly,
*Bob Kaplan, PC, MP
Solicitor-General of Canada*

March 26, 1982

Dear Rick,

I have received no reply from Kaplan yet, but apparently he has contacted the institution, since I was asked by a member of the administration why I was writing him. I do know that Kaplan has been bombarded by letters in my favour from MPs like Svend Robinson, Allan Lawrence and Pat Carney.

Otherwise, things are as dull as ever. I was elected President of the Jaycees here in the joint. Definition of irony — they won't let me write for TBP, but my name is being considered seriously for the position of editor of the joint's paper.

Meanwhile, still have my camera job, and still looking for a job on the street so I can get out of here.

Take care, give my best wishes to everyone and keep out of jail — it's the pits.

Regards,
Mac

April 2, 1982

Dear Rick,

If you check the Anglican Church hymn book, you will find that the first line of hymn 163 is:

"The strife is o'er, the battle done."

So it is with us.

I am in receipt of a letter from the Hon Bob Kaplan, PC, MP, dated 30 March 1982, and delivered yesterday to me. I will be sending you a copy. However, allow me to quote from several parts of the letter:

"The Commissioner of Corrections has reviewed the question of contributing articles to Body Politic and has approved your application."

How about that.

The conditions are: I agree not to use my own name, identify the institution or any other inmate, and present all copy to an official of the institution for review prior to sending out for publication. In addition, I may not identify any staff member and you have to put in a disclaimer at the beginning of every article to the effect that what I write does not represent the official views of the Correctional Service of Canada.

"Your reasons for contributing the articles are accepted and your first article appears to be generally acceptable..."

Rick, we (the Gay inmates that I know in here) are elated by our victory. And it is a victory. You, and others, may feel it was a small battle to maintain freedom of communication and expression of ideas, but it is more, much more, than that.

By allowing an openly Gay inmate to communicate with and write articles for an openly Gay publication, the Solicitor-General has acknowledged that there are Gay inmates, who were Gay before incarceration, and indicated that we are entitled to the same rights and privileges as all other inmates. By allowing me to write for The Body Politic, he has indicated that gay publications are not obscene or indecent, and therefore we should have no further trouble having them sent to us, provided, of course, that they are available over the counter in the same manner as Playboy or Penthouse. This has been an item that we, as Gay inmates, have been fighting for for some time.

One thing that I want to make perfectly clear, for the record. What I write are my own views. They may or may not be the views of other Gay inmates. They do not represent either the views of the Correctional Service of Canada or the administration of this or any other institution. When I write, I write for myself.

Therefore, when I refer to "we," I refer to a group of individuals in a non-restrictive or definitive manner. I undertook the battle with the administration as a sole inmate. I admit I informed other Gay inmates of my actions and decisions, but they must, in all rights, determine their own course of action and follow it.

In fact, with all due modesty, I succeeded in accomplishing something that many other Gay inmates said could never be done and that most other people thought I was nuts to even attempt. I did it not for them (although in the long run they may benefit), but for me. I did it because I felt I was right, and they were wrong, and I was damned if I was just going to sit there and take it. I did it with a lot of help from people like you who also believed I was right.

Each of us had a different reason for writing Kaplan to get him to say yes, but the end result was the same — and we got it.

The pen is mightier than the sword, and always will be. Illegitimus non carborundum. I think that's how it's written — been a long time since I used any Latin.

Anyhow, we're now past the hurdle. After all this, I just hope you find my writing worth printing.

Regards to you all, and thanks for your support.

Hot Spots: Toronto's Summer of '82

What to do on those hot summer days and nights in Toronto? If you're a tourist, it's a little hard to get a handle on what's going on, so we've drawn up some highlights you might not want to miss.

Any sunny day will find many gay people heading to Hanlan's Point, the gay beach at the far end of Toronto Island. Grab the ferry at the foot of Bay Street (bring a bike if you can). On the "mainland" is Kew Beach, reached by a very pleasant walk south from the Queen St East streetcar line (see Beaches). When you're bored with baking in the sun, take a walk east along the boardwalk. If you're hungry and want more than hotdogs, stroll up to Queen St to sample some of its casual eating spots — The Beach Café, The Beechtree, The Palm.

You can spend a fun afternoon watching the gay baseball teams on sunny Saturdays and Sundays from 11 am to 6:30 pm, on the diamond to the north on the east side of Riverdale Park. There are usually a few women participating.

Another way to spend Saturday afternoon is strolling up and down Yonge Street from Bloor to College Sts — chances are you'll see some familiar faces from the night before. Drop into Return to Sender (628 Yonge) for the latest in postcards, and look through Glad Day Bookshop for lesbian and gay magazines, books and records (648 Yonge, 2nd floor). Then get a sidewalk table at the Café New Orleans (Yonge & St Joseph) — the food's dreadful but the sidewalk traffic is always entertaining.

Unfortunately, fun spots for lesbians are few and far between, but of particular interest are Together (457 Church St) with a mostly younger crowd, and The Cameo Club (Friday and Saturday nights, $4 cover) at 95 Trinity St. for a casual evening of dancing and pool. The Mainstage (251 King St E) is apparently beginning to attract women as well. One recommended and handy place for women-watching is at the south end of The Eaton Centre, on the benches under the Michael Snow geese sculptures.

The Toronto Women's Bookstore (85A Harbord St) is a must for any visitor. With a good selection of feminist and lesbian reading material, it also serves as a kind of women's community meeting place. Check out the bulletin board or ask one of the helpful women working there about upcoming events. If you need an afternoon refresher break after that, drop into one of the nearby cafés on Harbord St — Harbord St Café, Major Roberts or Boulevard Café. Free Times Café (320 College St near Spadina) is another place popular with lesbians.

Most gay men's bars in Toronto tend to attract particular segments of the community, but screening at the door is rare (or at least unofficial), so feel free to roam.

Boots (592 Sherbourne St) always manages to fill up its huge lounge area with a broad variety of men. The Parkside (530 Yonge St) is fun for a few early evening drafts and a Saturday stopover is almost a Toronto institution. The Outpost (319 Jarvis St) has been the hit of the last few months for any man even faintly interested in denim and leather, but its lack of outdoor space may be a serious drawback in the summer. Buddy's (370 Church St) consistently draws large crowds of collegiate and post-collegiate types, and you really should drop into Les Cavaliers (418 Church St) next door for a more relaxed atmosphere — join in the chorus of "I'm Gonna Wash That Man Right Outta My Hair" around the piano.

Sunday afternoons, peaking about 4:30 pm, will find all sorts of men heading south to King Street East to do the seven block shuffle between the outdoor patios of 18 East (official home of the leather clubs) and the Albany Tavern (base for the baseball teams). Be prepared for a bit of déjà vu. Cheap hamburgers are available at both. Later on, until 11 pm (last call on Sundays), the crowds drift up town to the small dance floor at the Barn at 83 Granby St (no cover charge — great music).

Dudes (10 Breadalbane St) is the place to go every night after the other bars have closed down. It's unanimously condemned as an "attitude bar," but it's usually full, nonetheless. Discos generally get off the ground near midnight, except for The Manatee at 11A St Joseph St ($4 cover, men only), not licensed for liquor, which draws the under-18 set early on. Charly's, above the St Charles ($3 Friday, $4 Saturday, men only), and Stages, above the Parkside ($6, mixed), can usually guarantee good music and lighting. A devoted following flocks to Stages at midnight every Sunday to greet the beginning of the week. Friday promises to be a hot night as well.

The Rivoli (334 Queen St W) has a wide variety of events which appeal to the New Wave and art crowds around Queen Street West, including lots of gay people at the Pan-Am dances every Tuesday night, 11 pm to 4 am. Twilight Zone (185 Adelaide St W) and The Voodoo Club (5 St Joseph St) draw similar crowds. The Quest and Katrina's, both mixed, attract younger crowds eager to show off the latest fashions. The Quest is also popular with Asian men.

Up-to-date information on coming events can be gotten from the 923-GAYS recorded message line, or by calling the TAG information line, 964-6600. Women can also phone the Lesbian Phoneline, 960-3249.

Michael Wade talks to three Toronto filmmakers who've decided it's about time gay life got treated as something besides a crime "somewhere between shoplifting and armed robbery"

Track Two: beyond mass media

If three hundred people were arrested in one night on the same charge, you would expect a few news cameras to be around to catch all the action. And if 3,000 people were to disrupt the Friday night traffic on Toronto's Yonge Street, those same cameramen would be there too. The bathhouse raids that hit Toronto last year may have been a horrific, maddening atrocity. At the same time, they were news.

When watching filmed documentation, knowing who is behind the camera can be just as important as seeing the events in front of it. Most papers and news shows allowed the newsworthy event of the raid arrests to stand as a definition of what the baths mean, while regarding the police's intrusion into the baths — which is what branded them criminal — as mere law enforcement. As gay people who have seen our community most fully covered when its actions are considered criminal, we have come to expect variations on this scenario. As Larry Bush said in a recent Village Voice article, the effect this kind of media attention has "is traditionally to treat homosexuality as something one did — often illegally — that fell somewhere between shoplifting and armed robbery."

Since the mass media rarely recognize the gay community as a political or social entity, the task of constructing alternative media to redefine who gays are and what a gay community is must be taken up. Yet most alternative media are bound by financial and technical limitations which inhibit access to professional facilities, prohibiting comparable quality and access to the large audiences of the slick mass media.

KLS Communications, an independent gay film production company, wants to change that. They are creating a ninety-minute documentary on the history of the gay movement in Toronto, using their own coverage of the bath raids as a centrepiece.

Gordon Keith and Jack Lemmon (the K and the L of the company's acronym) met in Thunder Bay, their home town, while working with the National Film Board's Challenge for Change project in the early Seventies. The aim of that programme was to take the NFB's renowned documentary skill into regional communities and put the equipment and knowledge for developing a local film culture into new hands. The premise was that those who live within a culture should be the people best equipped to describe it.

While working on a hundred-year history of Thunder Bay, Keith and Lemmon met Harry Sutherland, who was working with Challenge for Change in Southern Ontario. Together, they decided to apply the NFB premise to something more important to their own lives by creating a Challenge for Change for Canada's gay population.

Their first venture was Truxx (1978), an 18-minute documentary of the police raid on the Montreal gay bar of the same name. "It was good in content," Lemmon says, "but we made it for $84 and with a lot of borrowed equipment.

The bath raids reconstructed for the film: "The threat of police action wasn't abstract paranoia anymore. Many of us knew someone who had been arrested that night, through the application of laws arbitrarily devised and even more arbitrarily enforced."

You can't show an audience something good in content but poor in technique."

"It was about time the gay movement got first-class," Sutherland says; the major goal of their next endeavour would be to clean up that technique. Hiring a professional cameraman, Martin Duckworth, they started making a film following the George Hislop election campaign in Toronto. After much pre-production hustling — which included approaching the CBC — "who told us, 'We've done gays to death!'" Sutherland says — they finally found a gay businessman to act as executive producer.

They decided to preface the film with a brief history of gay Toronto — from the closet-strewn Sixties and the early years of politicization, through the Community Homophile Association, Toronto Area Gays and the Anita Bryant visit to the Body Politic raid — and crown it with the auspicious finale of George Hislop's victory as municipal politician. Their working title was George Hislop Goes Straight... To City Hall.

There were two problems with this plan. First, the reluctance of the film's subject — gays themselves — to appear on camera made filming awkward. One night, while interviewing Hislop in a downtown bar, the place cleared as soon as the cameras appeared. People who were asked refused to be interviewed. The second obstacle is obvious: "On the night of the elections," Lemmon recounts, "we were shooting in George's campaign office and I whispered to Harry, 'What if George doesn't win?' Harry said, 'Don't be a Cassandra!'"

KLS's Keith, Sutherland and Lemmon: The CBC told them, "We've done gays to death!"

Despite the optimism, Jack's question became fact. With Hislop's defeat, Lemmon says, "our whole concept had been wiped out." They tried to devise new scenarios while reels of expensive Kodachrome, exposed and useless, sat piled in dark storage.

Then the bath raids came crashing down. "The night the bath raids happened," Lemmon remembers, "we knew there was going to be a massive demo and we needed to shoot that. So we got a crew together that night. We weren't expecting anything big, we were just winging it."

As anyone who was on Yonge Street that Friday night knows, what KLS had just winged itself into was an angry pounding procession of 3,000 people. "The biggest thing that had happened in Toronto in a long time, and it just fell on our laps," Lemmon says. "Pretty soon we had demo footage coming out of our ears!"

Angrily retitled Enough Is Enough, the film was quickly kicked out of its inertia and gathered momentum as the impact of the raids was felt by the gay community. The threat of police action against homosexuals was not abstract paranoia anymore. Many of us knew someone who had been arrested that night, through the application of laws that were too arbitrarily devised and even more arbitrarily enforced. The threat was very real.

The prospective interviewees who had backed out of the Hislop film now wanted to appear in the bath raid movie. A Right To Privacy Committee open meeting in a high school auditorium set aside one area of seating where no one would be filmed. Throughout that meeting, those chairs were left nearly vacant. It was becoming apparent that gay people did not agree with the CBC: they had not been done to death by the media. The media had rarely shown the selectiveness of law enforcement, had never thought it necessary to recognize the gay community's alliances with non-gay organizations like trade unions and the black community, had never been convinced of the necessity for a gay community to exist in Toronto as a political entity.

The list of people who agreed to speak out publicly via KLS is impressive: former Mayor John Sewell, police/gay relations analyst Arnold Bruner, writer Margaret Atwood, school trustee Fran Endicott. Representatives from the gay community and, most impressively, some of the men arrested in the raids volunteered their voices. "If you're gay in Toronto," Sutherland says of the bath raids, "being on the media is a part of life now."

Since May 1981, Keith, Lemmon and Sutherland have been raising money on their own and working vigorously on a film for which they have received no payment. Even now, two weeks before the film's premiere, KLS still needs a lot of money to finish post-production work.

The high cost is of their own making. For first-class production, they have hired another professional cinematographer (Leo Zourdoumis) and a professional sound technician (Karin Michael), as well as renting an electronic editing table. Carol Pope and Kevin Staples of the band Rough Trade have been signed up to compose the soundtrack.

From the rushes and single reel of rough cuts I have seen, some impressive images linger: the 52 Division police station on the night of the first demo, the tracking shot down the hallways of the Richmond Street Baths showing a news photographer dutifully clicking pictures of bashed-in doorways, Donald Banks (head of police intelligence) warbling away incomprehensibly about the "criminal elements within the gay community" on a local TV talk show, the noisy enthusiasm turned to sour silence in the Hislop campaign headquarters as scrutineers phone in news of the defeat.

As more people see the film, KLS will still be busy trying to work out a respectable distribution deal. They hope to screen it at film festivals in Berlin, Chicago and Oxford. "Film festivals like to show political films," Sutherland believes, pointing to the successes of P4W and Not A Love Story at Toronto's Festival of Festivals last year. "But we want to show it to a gay audience first. We want it used politically to start with." The film will have its world premiere at "Doing It!", the national gay conference in Toronto, on Thursday July 1 at the Bloor Cinema.

They have retitled it Track Two, a name lifted from police jargon: they call one area of downtown Toronto "frequented by female prostitutes, their pimps and customers" Track One. The gay ghetto is Track Two. The police sense a connection; with this film, KLS wants to question that logic.

"Documentaries are expected to be objective," Lemmon observes. "But they aren't ever. We don't believe we can't be biased."

"Divorcing sex from love has real but temporary virtues. If we had been allowed to explore all those avenues of desire as children, the exercise might not have any attractions for us...."

Every time I try to write about sexual and moral choices, I find myself starting back with Adam and Eve, and I've written the outline of a book rather than an essay before I even get to the 19th century. I feel I have to give historical, scholarly evidence for a view I have arrived at: that much of what has been said about human sexuality is so much hocus-pocus, whether it has to do with the evil nature of woman as the downfall of man, the homosexual component in us all which must be sublimated for the sake of human culture, or the dark, anti-social forces in man which make him a rapist and murderer.

As lesbians and gay men, we have spent too much sexual time either aping heterosexual marriage in order to exonerate ourselves, or accepting outlaw status and flaunting it, trying to be either the good or bad children of our culture. We have not spent enough time defining ourselves, our particular needs, desires and goals.

We have no way of knowing what kind of sexual creatures we would be if we had been allowed to grow up in our sexuality. What we do know is that some of us are so fearful, guilty and hung up that any sexual experience is too threatening, and many more of us cope only by hedging it round with restrictions and taboos.

Those who achieve the freedom to do what they really want often get there only by means of drugs, and then feel more comfortable isolating that experience so that the implications of those appetites don't have to be dealt with in domestic, affectionate living.

We talk too much as if our sexual tastes were fixed. That, too, is a defensive habit of mind. For we all know that we grow and change sexually as we do in every other way, if we allow ourselves to. Edna St Vincent Millay was my favourite poet and a Catholic spinster school principal an object of my desire when I was fourteen. The first time she ever kissed me was last month when I ran into her while visiting another friend in an old people's home. Even she had changed that much! But it's not a fantasy I still cherish. Nor do I any longer read Edna St Vincent Millay. We grow up. We grow old.

Men, probably because they do not get pregnant, have always been able to confront their sexual needs as something separate from their domestic lives. Men mainly interested in women have had to marry or pay or rape until quite recently. What is remarkable about the recreational sex gay men celebrate more and more openly is not its detachment from meaningful relationship — whore houses have provided that for centuries — but its detachment from commerce or coercion.

"Instant gratification" is a term associated with infants, something that, as we grow up, we learn not to demand or expect. What some gay men have always known is how to recreate their infancy and childhood together. One gay bar in Vancouver is called "The Play Pen." In parks designed for children to play in, in baths like permissive nurseries or playschools, where grown-ups are there only to help if people hurt

SEXUAL INFANCY

Jane Rule on instant gratification, narcissistic dependency, and the different ways women and men are affected by being forced to live through our erotic childhood only after we've grown up themselves and to clean up the mess, polymorphous perversity — that fancy term for being unhousebroken and erotically fixed on everything — can be celebrated.

Gay men have been so busy defending their right to these pleasures against the outrage of the moral majority and police raids that there hasn't been comfortable space, in public anyway, for them to discuss the limitations as well as the pleasures of such sexual activity. Gay men who don't like the parks and baths speak freely enough against them, but for those who do enjoy them there is more defiant celebration of them as the solution to Christmas and the fulfillment of fantasy than evaluation of them as they connect to, or disconnect from, domesticity, friendship, love.

When I hear gay men say, as I often have, "My friends are more important to me than my lovers," I am not sure what I am hearing. Either betrayal is so inevitable and painful in sexual relationships that it is best to make as little emotional investment as possible, or sex itself has so little importance as an expression of the whole person that it is rather more like eating or excreting than like talking and working. In either case, sex is seen as something apart from significant relationship, probably inimicable to it because, if taken seriously, it can inspire deadly possessiveness and jealousy, kill spontaneity and therefore desire itself. The very sexual practices indulged in, if introduced into an important relationship, could reduce it to play-acting on other levels, infantilize it. The best that can be achieved in sexual exchange is mutual self-interest, not the genuine altruism which we call love. That is reserved for friendship.

It's a saner solution than many for disposing of sexual energy. It certainly compares favourably to the more accepted practice of encouraging young men to go off and get killed in foreign wars. But it is not a life-long answer.

Youth and good looks are coin of a kind. A taste for boys who ask to be paid may be a way of prolonging that stay in infancy, or it may be a way of moving to a more complex relationship that has to admit affection, protection, material responsibility. Most adults learn their first altruism in the love of children, whether there is sexual involvement or not. Women freely admit erotic responses to their nursing infants, though the shock of their love is not that delicious intimacy, but the sacrifice of time, sleep, sometimes nearly of sanity itself to serve that infant dependence. Children, however, grow up and leave home. If they are not our own, they're unlikely to return home with children of their own to share with us.

Gay men who restrict themselves to recreational sex fear the loneliness of aging, and work hard to keep themselves fit and attractive to postpone the time when they must buy their pleasure or go without.

Divorcing sex from love has real but temporary virtues. If we have been allowed to explore all those avenues of desire as children, the exercise might not have any attractions for us, but certainly most of us aren't ready to take our sexual selves into altruistic love when we're in our twenties. The question is what sort of sexual experience not only delights us when we're young but prepares us for a satisfying life when we're older. Is it a fantasy to want to arrive at fifty or sixty or seventy whole rather than drained, rich in experience rather than made cynical by it?

Women, for all the greater sexual restraints placed on us, are not as deprived in infancy and childhood of physical affection. Our vanity is encouraged, our interest in our bodies validated by others' interest. And we aren't as long trapped in childish bodies as boys are, who must work for their muscles while we simply watch our breasts grow.

Though some lesbians envy gay men their sexual freedom, their parks and baths, most of us are uncertain that we have the same kind of sexual childhood to discover and live through. Conditioned from the beginning to think of our bodies as instruments to give pleasure and life to other people, our first rebellion is against the male eroticism imposed on us, that sexual urgency so often indifferent to us as people or to our threatened futures. Recreational sex between women can seem simply a re-enactment of the male indifference that has been so threatening to us. For we haven't been deprived of sexual experience so much as bullied by it. All any female has to do is indicate that she is available; as so many men have pointed out, we're all the same in the dark.

What many women want most of other women is mothering, that protective, attentive anticipation of all needs in order to serve them. In the safety of that care and love, eroticism flowers. Infant narcissism is at the centre of our awakening sexuality. The older woman, therefore, is attractive. The complaint of younger women in bars is that so few older women go to them. The complaint of older women about the bars is that they are filled with children.

Female teachers are so often erotic objects for female students because they are mother substitutes. Women who are mothers are attractive to other women for that reason. The cry of nearly every woman, whether to her husband, her children or her female lover, is "Grow up!" In her presence no one wants to, yet her own needs are often as infantile as theirs — for a change to be cherished, served, protected unconditionally.

Women, therefore, aren't so much inclined to separate sexuality from significant relationship as to isolate sexuality in love, to possess and be possessed so thoroughly that they are finally forced to leave home for the sake of their adult selves. Kate Millett's Sita is a classic study of that process. For just as the infant fantasies of the baths don't translate easily into adult friendship, so infant dependency also inhibits adult love.

There are those of us who want to live alone. "I enjoy my own company," my eighty-eight-year-old neighbour says, who has always lived alone. The work of growing and changing sexually is not always worth it for people with other commitments and goals which seem to them finally more important. But for others of us, discovering that sex can become something other than a sport or a dependency is important because we have learned that by means of it we can express tenderness, compassion, joy, wonder and serenity, even though we are therefore more vulnerable to frustration, pain and grief.

Because we are sexual creatures we are mortal. Our bodies are not simple playthings. Our bodies die. To learn to live in them fully while we have the opportunity involves risk and care.

Hatred of the body and fear of death have inspired most of our culture's morality. Love of the body and love of life seem to me good alternatives for beginning again. □

Both gay rights advocates and anti-gay bigots say that sexuality is a private matter. Each side means something different: 'Let us live our lives in peace,' and 'Get back into the closet.'"

Dear camerado!
I confess I have urged you onward with me, and still urge you, without the least idea what is our destination, Or whether we shall be victorious, or utterly quelled and defeated.

As I Lay With My Head in Your Lap, Camerado
Walt Whitman

How has the lesbian and gay movement grown and evolved since that night in June 1969 when the Stonewall Inn was raided by cops, and the patrons fought back with mockery and fury? In September of the same year, the first issue of a radical gay liberation newspaper called Come Out! appeared. Here is a telling passage from the first editorial: "We will not be gay bourgeoisie, searching for the sterile 'American Dream' of the ivy-covered cottage and the corporation job, but neither will we tolerate the exclusion of homosexuals from any area of American life.... Does society make a place for us as a man? A woman? A homosexual or a lesbian? How does the family structure affect us? What is sex? What does it mean?"

What is love? As homosexuals we are in a unique position to examine these questions from a fresh point of view. You'd better believe we are going to do so — that we are going to transform the society at large through the realization of our own consciousness."

Today in 1982, after years of turmoil alternating with apathy, it is too easy for seasoned gay people to smile at such words, like adults listening to baby-talk. The fact is that the questions which children raise often take whole lives to answer — perhaps the whole of human history. Society, family, sex, love — these raise questions for even the most "apolitical" gay person, questions which we are struggling to answer in our daily lives. Those who wrote that editorial back in 1969 had every right to speak for themselves and to try steering the gay movement in a radical direction. When they insisted that they would not be gay bourgeoisie, they were surely aware that other gay people would be. True, their attack on the American Dream and the ivy-covered cottage seems facile now — some silly things were said in those early days — but those who now equate resignation with maturity are simply resigned. They claim they got wiser, but they just got tired.

A full decade after that editorial was written, Vito Russo quoted a veteran of the Stonewall rebellion in The Village Voice: "When we fought back at the Stonewall ten years ago, we didn't think the benefits would be seven hundred leather bars and the right to join the army. That isn't exactly what we had in mind." At the time of Stonewall, many counter-culture gay activists believed that a new world was rising from the ashes of the old. Capitalism and patriarchy would collapse of their own weight and weakness, and society would become one great androgynous Commune. Instead of the Commune, what we got was Christopher Street and Castro Street; gay hippies became gay clones.

There are still some gays who consider gay ghettos completely corrupt and who believe the gay movement has been completely co-opted. They share this view, in fact, with some of the most mechanical straight leftists.

The reality is more complex and hopeful. The gay ghetto is not utopia, yet the urban concentration of self-identified gays has been a great source of power. Without gay visibility and solidarity, populist uprisings like the Stonewall, San Francisco and Toronto rebellions would have been impossible. Ghettos of all kinds are contradictory in nature: for gays, as for many others, they serve both as a detention camp and a liberated zone. The Jewish ghettos of Russia and Eastern Europe nourished a rich culture, but the Cossacks knew where to find many victims when they were in the mood for a pogrom. A ghetto is somewhat like a factory, where many people are gathered to be exploited, but where they also have the power to call a strike, or even kick out the boss and take over the place themselves.

Our right to the world is denied in

Ken Popert:
Public sexuality and social space

The question of so-called public sex is one which threatens to divide gays from supportive straights, gay men from lesbians and gay men from gay men. To place this issue in its proper political setting, we have to grasp a significant but little discussed aspect of gay male promiscuity: I mean its tendency to create a collective consciousness.

It is the search for new sex partners that brings large numbers of gay men together for frequent and prolonged periods in such traditional hunting grounds as bars, baths and even parks. This concentration of numbers in relatively small areas is precisely the circumstance which makes political organization a possibility for gay men. It is worth remembering that the current, unexhausted wave of gay struggle began more than a decade ago in a bar. Bars and baths are to the gay movement what factories are to the labour movement: the context in which masses of people acquire a shared sense of identity and the ability to act together for the common good. These commercial establishments are the fountainhead of the gay movement; in them, we still get most of our local news, hand out and receive leaflets, gather before and after demonstrations.

Consequently, any move to combat public sex by restricting the facilities which make it possible is, by design or not, an attack on the capacities of gay people to organize themselves for political purposes. Under the pretext of curbing promiscuity, our opponents can deal a potentially fatal blow to the political base of the gay movement.

A complementary danger is posed by gays and straights who promote marriage-like coupledom as the way to meet the sexual and emotional needs of gay men.

The antisocial, depoliticizing character of marriage and the nuclear family is already well attested. The members of marriage and family direct their loyalties inward, neglecting the welfare of the larger community. Locked in the missionary position, they turn their backs to all but themselves. A similar phenomenon is observable in small-town gay communities, where it is not unusual for a newly formed couple to withdraw, subtracting themselves from the larger social scene for the term of their relationship.

Promiscuity knits together the social fabric of the gay male community; the imposition of widespread marriage-like coupling inevitably goes hand-in-hand with the abolition of that community.

If the public character of our sexuality is, as I believe, such an important factor in the life of the gay community and the gay movement, how do we go about defending it?

The place to begin is in our own community. The number of gay men who look upon the baths or cruising parks as embarrassing evidence of our immorality is not small. There is a disturbing story that the complaint which precipitated last year's raid on the Pisces Spa in Edmonton, resulting in the arrest of 60 men, was lodged by a gay man who wanted to see the baths closed because they give gay people a bad name. And it hardly needs to be mentioned that substantial numbers of lesbians simply do not appreciate the centrality of public sexuality in the lives of gay men.

Gays and lesbians who are content to live and love within the couple have to wake up to the fact that it is their promiscuous brothers (and, increasingly, sisters) who make the gay movement possible. Without that movement, there would be no safety for gays at all, not even for gay or lesbian couples tucked away quietly in the suburbs.

The defence of our promiscuity among potential straight allies has to rest on our ability to persuade people that gay sex cannot be understood simply by making analogies with heterosexual institutions and practices. It is shortsighted to suggest that gays should not have steam baths, for example, because heterosexuals don't have them. The fact is that, although gays and straights have approximately the same emotional and sexual needs, we meet those needs in very different ways: there is no one-to-one correlation to be drawn between marriage, family life and brothels on the one hand and lovers, parks, bars and baths on the other. If comparisons are to be made, then it is the total organization of our sexual and emotional lives which must be weighed, not isolated fragments.

Finally, we have to argue that the simple classification of space into public and private is just not delicate enough to capture existing realities. A gay bar or bathhouse is neither a public space nor a private space; it is a collective space where the mores of the occupying collectivity must prevail. In this way, public sexuality, which is in fact collective sexuality, can be afforded a legitimate social space.

countless ways, and by default gay ghettos become the only place where many of us feel relatively free or safe. For that reason, gay ghettos become lightning rods for right-wing wrath. There are people of all political stripes who plainly fear and resent our pleasure, freedom and strength.

And we ourselves, in the very act of casting off our chains, often see freedom through the eyes of slaves. How could it be otherwise? Much of the media maintains a fair weather liberalism, but prevailing winds of reaction alter its course. In 1980 CBS broadcast the infamous "Gay Power, Gay Politics," which focused on San Francisco as the place where gay power had advanced furthest. The CBS crew took a safari through San Francisco, and it showed the civilized world a zoo. A few gay power-brokers were presented as jackals who had sharpened their teeth on Mayor Dianne Feinstein. The leather numbers became iguanas, meant to rouse a dread of reptiles; the drag queens and Hallowe'en scenes surely roused disgust among the hawkish citizenry — all that peacock plumage!

But most significantly, a hidden camera was used to film gay men cruising half-naked in Buena Vista Park, like savages roaming the bushland, perhaps. A nuclear family living near the park was interviewed in the following segment, and the parents expressed fears that their children might be traumatized by the sight of sex.

Is it innately more traumatizing to see a cock sucked than to see an apple eaten?

Privacy, autonomy and the state

Sex forgotten is sex best served.... I look forward to a homosexual leadership that values its gains (and they have been immense) and adopts a strategy of low public visibility to keep from losing these gains. The closet is no longer a guilt-ridden cell. Today it is, as a man's home should be, his castle.

Charles McCabe, columnist for The San Francisco Chronicle, from a series called "Sex in the Streets," 1979.

The right of an individual to live as he or she chooses can become offensive. The gay community is going to have to face this.

San Francisco Mayor Dianne Feinstein, interviewed in Ladies Home Journal, 1979.

Legal and "common sense" definition of public and private space, property, rights and duties evolve through history, and tell us much about the moral and material order of any given social group. In the Fall 1981 issue of Gay Books Bulletin, an illuminating piece by Wayne Dynes was published called "Privacy, Sexual Orientation and the Self-Sovereignty of the Individual: Continental Theories, 1762-1908." Dynes argues that privacy evolved as a complex of concepts, and he traces one branch of their evolution "to the heart of the European Enlightenment." After the French Revolution, a mass of literature was printed dealing with political reform, and likewise much literature appeared dealing with sexuality. Dynes writes, "A little known but highly significant example of the mixture of sex and politics — or sexual politics, if you will — is a brochure of 1790: Les petits bougres au manège. The anonymous work presents itself as a plea for homosexual rights, apparently the first of its kind.... The Revolution, according to the writer, has secured citizens in their right to property. Now what could be more clearly one's own property than the parts of one's body, including one's genitals? What citizens choose to do with them, either alone or in the company of other consenting citizens, is not the business of the state."

In an ambitious 1908 doctoral dissertation called "The Right over One's Self," German law student (and later gay activist) Kurt Hiller dealt with the following topics and in the following order: suicide, self-mutilation, duelling, incest, homosexuality, bestiality and abortion. "Hiller's analysis," Dynes writes, "of the various rationalizations that have accumulated in favor of criminal sanctions in the categories he considers reveals that they almost always have a religious or mystical origin. As such they are arguments that, in a modern secular state, should not be permitted to pass unchallenged. Ultimately, however, the key to the matter lies in the fact that the criminalization of all these things interferes with the right to control one's own body."

The moral and legal order of society may require sexual secrecy at the same time as the material order makes such secrecy impossible. In colonial and rural America, for example, many large families lived, loved and died within homes consisting of a single room. Privacy, therefore, often had to be found out of doors. In his book, Privacy: How to Protect What's Left of It, Robert Ellis Smith points out that sex "didn't always take place in the bedroom, of course. In fact, men and women often retreated to the woods for intimate relationships.... Domestic relations court records of the period are filled with accounts like the one about a couple 'making love among the mustard tops and other wedges.'"

In cold weather and at night, a barn was often found suitable, but sometimes a curtain hung round a bed had to serve, and sharing beds with relatives and visiting strangers was common. Such arrangements encouraged a certain communalism, though they also encouraged sexual sneakiness, particularly in a Christian, and predominantly Puritan, culture. Making love among the mustard tops sounds charming, but this erotic idyll is to be found, after all, in court records.

According to an account of town records in David Flaherty's Privacy in Colonial New England, there was much commotion in Boston in 1757 because of "many persons washing themselves in publick and frequented places to the great reproach of modesty and good manners." And so the town meeting "voted and ordered that no person whosoever above the age of 12 years shall in less than an hour after sun-set undress themselves and go into the water within ten rods of any dwelling house in this town, at that time inhabited, nor shall any person being in the water, swim to such parts of the town as to be plainly within sight of any dwelling house...." Town meetings seem to me a good form of democracy, but I wonder how many of those "many persons washing themselves in publick" were present to vote at that meeting. I suspect that the Puritan merchants found Boston's riff-raff too undisciplined. Nude beaches have provoked similar controversy and ordinances in recent years.

In 1890, writes Robert Ellis Smith, "Mrs Samuel D Warren was outraged at the press coverage of parties and dances in the city of Boston. This prompted her husband, a professor of law at Harvard University, to join a colleague, Louis D Brandeis, in devising 'the right of the individual to be let alone.' A Warren-Brandeis law journal article on the right to privacy became the fountainhead of later law and social policy in the United States...." In that article, Warren and Brandeis expressed special concern about the developing communications technology: "Instantaneous photographs and newspaper enterprise have invaded the sacred precincts of private and domestic life and numerous mechanical devices threaten to make good the prediction that 'what is whispered in the closet shall be proclaimed from the housetops.'"

We can see that the same technological advances which profited the well-to-do classes were also being used to expose their personal and social life to the world. There was, after all, a profit to be made from the increasing literacy of the masses. In 1890 the lower classes of Boston were largely housed in crowded and filthy slums, as they were elsewhere in the country as it became more industrialized and urbanized. Workers and poor people did not have the option of pursuing sex and privacy in the woods as did colonial and rural Americans; we can be sure that many trysts took place in the alleys and odd corners of the city, as has always been true of city life. When it came time to formulate the right to privacy in legal terms, that formulation was not prompted by any concern for the privacy of the lower classes. No, what prompted its formulation was the fact that Mrs Samuel D Warren was outraged at the press coverage of parties and dances in the city of Boston.

The bourgeois origin of that legal right does not mean that it should be despised as such; it does mean that bourgeois formulations of privacy serve bourgeois interests best. The economic cycles of capitalism forcibly collectivize and atomize masses of people, with little respect to the organic integrity of communities — much less personal autonomy or privacy. When state snoopers try to take a woman off welfare because she keeps "a man in the house," she may have precious few legal or financial means to defend her right to privacy. The very wealthy, in contrast, often protect their privacy with extensive perimeters of property. Fifty years after formulating the right to privacy with his colleague Warren, Louis D Brandeis was savvy enough to say, "We can have democracy in this country, or we can have great wealth in a few hands, but we can't have both."

When the National Committee for Sexual Civil Liberties met in Detroit in May, 1981 for its twelfth annual conference, the opening discussion concerned the police harassment of gay individuals and the raids on gay bathhouses in Canada. As Paul Hardman wrote in his conference report for Gay Books Bulletin (Fall 1981), "What has to be understood is the fact that the law is quite different in Canada, despite our common Anglo-Saxon heritage, so that Canadians do not have Constitutional rights in the sense that we do in the United States." Canada's federal and provincial governments, with the significant exception of Quebec, have recently adopted a constitution; like the US Constitution, it has no provision which specifically defines and defends the right to privacy. But that right has a legal history in the US, as it does not in Canada. TBP reported last November that a provincial court judge had acquitted retired teacher Don Franco of being the keeper of a common bawdyhouse in his own home, and the defence lawyer in that case was quoted as saying, "This is the first criminal case to make the right to privacy a keystone of the judgment — it's important in American law but almost never encountered in Canada."

The Canadian gay movement is fighting on many fronts, and these battles are important not only for gays, but for all struggling sectors of Canadian society. TBP is waging a crucial fight for freedom of speech and of the press, as is well known. Don Franco's trial and acquittal is a groundbreaking legal event in Canada, particularly since Judge Charles stated explicitly that Section 183 of the Criminal Code, concerning "anyone found in a common bawdyhouse" "certainly makes breathtaking inroads into a person's right to privacy.... Parliament should take a look at it."

The Right to Privacy Committee is, of course, admirably embattled. All of these fights are well worth fighting, and I have great admiration for the gay Canadians in the front ranks of struggle. I hope raising questions about the right to privacy is not, therefore, taken as mean-spirited sniping. But the right to privacy is a double-edged sword. Privacy can be enforced as well as pursued. In a comradely spirit, I will give some examples of the unwise use of this weapon in the US gay movement. From these examples it should be clear that there is such a thing as reckless reformism, since we have all heard to the point of nausea about reckless radicalism.

When Charles Brydon resigned as co-director of The National Gay Task Force, he gave a speech to a group of gay professionals stressing that a key strategy in the coming years should be pursuit of the right to privacy. Brydon stressed that conservatives are great partisans of this right. Ronald Reagan, after all, opposed the anti-gay Briggs Amendment on the grounds that it constituted government intrusion into personal life. Likewise, arch-conservative Barry Goldwater blasted the Moral Majority for obscuring the separation of church and state — a strict theocracy is not ideal for business. The right is not immune to factionalism, yet all sectors of the right are free to interpret our right to privacy as being our right to the closet. Gay professionals and well-to-do gays are not necessarily averse to this interpretation if, as Charles McCabe suggested in The San Francisco Chronicle, they can make their closets as commodious as castles.

In a time of reaction, more voices are being heard in the gay movement urging gays to get on the right side of power. But it is precisely with the ruling Republicans that the right to privacy strategy lands gays in trouble. Tim Drake, one of two openly gay delegates at the 1980 Republican convention, was featured in an article in The Washington Blade. Drake argued that conservatives who take a principled stand on privacy would be likely to repeal sodomy statutes and other discriminatory legislation. "However," the article notes, "gay Republicans admit that a Catch-22 situation arises when attempts are made to gain Republican support for gay rights legislation." Drake explained: "If you say we must make laws so that the government won't interfere in our private lives, many Republicans turn around and ask, 'Wouldn't this civil rights legislation put government control over a social issue? Isn't this more governmental intrusion?' I tend to avoid the issue altogether," Drake concluded.

Here is a classic example of the way in which folks who abandon the struggle for gay liberation are finally forced to compromise even the struggle for gay rights. We cannot be anarchist purists in this matter, disdaining the legal apparatus of the state entirely. Certainly we should have no delusions: legislation is not liberation; being legal is not being free. Yet gay liberation means waging an open fight for gay rights as one means of building a militant, grass-roots movement.

In the April 1, 1982 issue of The Advocate, Larry Bush writes, "There is a good case to be made for a link between gay interests and conservatives of conscience, as gay Republicans frequently tell their gay Democratic friends.... Some prominent anti-abortion leaders, notably Paul Brown of the Life Amendment Political Action Committee and Representative Henry Hyde have also dissociated themselves from anti-gay efforts...."

The effort to deprive women of the choice of abortion is a crime against women. It was with good reason that Kurt Hiller included both abortion and homosexuality under the right over one's self. The conservatives of conscience Larry Bush mentions would be better known as opportunist reactionaries. A tactical and temporary retreat on the gay issue does not prevent them from advocating reactionary moralism. Gay males who pursue their own privacy at the expense of the autonomy of women will certainly lose allies. Gay male separatists may forge a fragile alliance with the gangsters in government, but this has nothing to do with gay liberation. This is merely the business-as-usual horse-trading of political hacks."

The political rationale for concentrating on the right to privacy was best explained by Jim Foster, who is a Democratic Party lieutenant. According to a recent profile in Christopher Street (issue 60), "Foster feels that the gay community needs a new rallying point and a new symbol. The new word is 'privacy,' and the symbol is that old favorite, the dollar sign." Civil rights, according to Foster, simply *bore*s people: after all, wasn't all that taken care of by Martin Luther King? "Foster insists that the gay community's problems are neither economic survival (for most gay people), nor are they strictly a matter of civil rights.... Our issue, he claims, is the protection of our privacy.... Politicians, he believes, are ready to let us define our issues this way.... That's where the dollar sign comes in. 'The truth is that money buys you access to the political process,' explains this gay community's mercenary Machiavellian." An endearing epithet, no doubt.

It is due to gay leaders like Foster that gays are often perceived as being genetically programmed for affluence — and represented accordingly. In one sense, the gay movement is no different than most movements for social change in the US — it is not really one movement but several, spread across the social and political spectrum. The gay movement Foster belongs to is satisfied with a political system which is more and more inaccessible the less and less money one makes; such a system deserves to be turned upside down. The members of Foster's movement can indeed afford to be bored with civil rights; they can indeed be satisfied with pursuing their right to privacy.

These are examples of political pitfalls which Canadian gays will certainly face, even if the right to privacy is carved in marble in every Canadian court. As things stand, the seemingly scholastic debates in Canadian courts about private and public space and behaviour are, in fact, revelations of the sexual and social order. "Acts of gross indecency" are mentioned in the bawdyhouse laws, and leave much to the imagination; if they are defined to include homosexual acts as such, then any place where gays have sex — public or private, bathhouse or bedroom — becomes a bawdyhouse. When the first Barracks trial ended last June, Judge Rice chose not to accept this argument from the government prosecutor. Rather than judging indecency by the kind of acts performed, Judge Rice judged indecency by the number of persons participating in such acts. If the act is not in-

"Gay males who pursue their own privacy at the expense of women will certainly lose allies. Gay male separatists may forge a fragile alliance with the gangsters in government, but this has nothing to do with gay liberation. This is merely the business-as-usual horse-trading of political hacks."

Danny Cockerline:

Getting tough on washroom sex

In a decision handed down May 31 in Toronto, Provincial Court Judge Maurice Charles said that if the epidemic number of sexual offences in washrooms persists, "the courts will have to progressively increase the form of punishment."

The statement followed efforts by Crown Attorney J Atkinson to make an example of a 22-year-old first offender who plainclothes police officers stumbled upon masturbating at a urinal in the third-floor washroom of the downtown Hudson's Bay department store.

The accused, who was not represented by a lawyer at trial, pleaded guilty on May 21 and was sentenced to a year's probation May 31. The delay in sentencing was a result of efforts on the part of the Crown to convince Judge Charles that a jail sentence would be necessary in this case to deter other potential offenders. "All the judges have been giving conditional discharges," said the Crown, "yet they just keep coming in — six to ten cases a day."

An assertion by Atkinson that The Body Politic was contributing to this situation by reporting the discharges prompted Charles to postpone sentencing until a copy of the magazine could be obtained. "You show it to me if they think it is a joke," he instructed the Crown.

The accused returned for sentencing with lawyer Peter Maloney, six witnesses and several copies of The Body Politic in tow. After perusing copies of the magazine and hearing testimony from TBP collective member Chris Bearchell, Judge Charles concluded that "there is nothing here to suggest that The Body Politic is celebrating discharges or encouraging washroom sex."

Maloney questioned the assumption that men who use washrooms for sex also read TBP. "People charged with this offence are disconnected from the mainstream. Using this man as an example will not reach these people."

Arnold Bruner, author of a report on relations between the police and the gay community, wondered whether the police were interested in deterrence at all. "The police don't get marks for prevention; they get them for arrests." Commenting on Judge Charles's warning of stiffer penalties, Bruner said, "This only encourages the police to bring more of these cases before the courts. It does nothing to prevent washroom sex."

decent, why does the number of participants make it so? Does the act of eating become indecent when a dozen people sit down at one table? Is a murder made less indecent when there is no accomplice or witness?

Judge Rice found the Barracks indecent because it was not "private." It would be hard to find a judge who would come out and say that sexuality as such is indecent. This is the twentieth century. Yet the question arises: How has the right to privacy become so easily translated into the duty of sexual secrecy?

Even in the US, where the legal definition of privacy is more sophisticated, that particular and peculiar translation has been made by many local, state and Supreme Court decisions. In 1976, in a case involving homosexuals, the Supreme Court upheld a decision by a Virginia court that a state law punishing sodomy between consenting adults was not an unconstitutional invasion of privacy. That seems a simple case. A few months later the Supreme Court refused to consider a Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals decision that allowed Virginia to punish a married couple for committing sodomy, which in this case meant that the wife sucked off her husband and a male friend within the couple's home. Someone took photographs, which their daughters found and displayed at school and which were finally secured by the authorities. "Once a married couple admits strangers as onlookers, federal protection dissolves," decided the Fourth Circuit. "If the couple performs sexual acts for the excitation or gratification of welcome onlookers, they cannot selectively claim the state is an intruder."

We may expect every kink of barbarism from the state when such legalism passes for logic. Presumably the state has the right to crash any party you throw in your home or out, as long as the activities at that party — whether eating spaghetti, watching TV or reading poetry — produce an erotic intensity of excitation or gratification in welcome onlookers and participants.

Three members of that court dissented from that decision. Robert Ellis Smith writes, "What would not normally be punishable (sexual adventures by a married couple in private) cannot be punishable because of the presence of a third person," they said. The dissenters further recognized that sexual activity between married persons 'can never be made criminal' — even if done in public — unless it violates some other criminal offence such as lewdness, indecent exposure, or disorderly conduct."

When, we might ask, does public sex not violate some such criminal statute? Notice the legal nicety with which the dissenters deal with the sexual adventures of married heterosexuals; would they have taken such care with the Virginia homosexuals convicted of the same crime?

"We conclude that secrecy is not a necessary element of the right (to privacy)," said the dissenters. According to Smith, "One of the dissenters was J Braxton Craven, Jr, a respected Harvard-educated jurist who thought that the right to privacy is not limited to what goes on in private, contrary to popular impression." The right to privacy, Craven stated, "may be termed more accurately 'the right to be let alone' or personal autonomy, or simply 'personhood.'"

A standard statement made by both gay rights advocates and anti-gay bigots is that sexuality is a private matter. Each side means something different: Let us live our lives in peace, and Get back into the closet. Sexual privacy is enforced in our society for the same reason that sexual privacy is invaded: precisely because, in Robert Ellis Smith's words, "Sex is the least private of acts." We might say that exposing one's "private parts" to even one person is a more public act than walking in a crowd all clothed. This very stripping away of civilized garb and sexual restraint must therefore be shrouded in secrecy. Secrecy, as we have seen, was Judge Rice's definition of privacy and decency in the first Barracks trial; secrecy again was a prime condition of privacy and decency when the US Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals allowed Virginia to convict a couple of sodomy.

The pyramid of the state begins to crumble when too many slaves become too undisciplined at one time in one place. "Political repression begins with sexual repression," says historian Herman Rebel, "Sexual activity defies the state, because it is the ultimate act of anarchy. Sex is what two persons decide to do." Two persons, or three, or four, five, six.... It is true that the more people involved in sex or any other "private" activity, the further the boundaries of privacy must be extended. If two people make love all alone in a wilderness, we might say they had privacy. If six or a dozen people make love in one room, then we might say that privacy should include the right to choose one's own public — a right which should apply in both bedrooms and bathhouses. Or whorehouses, for that matter. The further we extend the concept of privacy, the more public and worldly it must become; here again the heart of the matter is "the right to be let alone, or personal autonomy, or simple 'personhood.'"

"The right to be let alone" takes us full circle back to the classic formulation of Warren and Brandeis in 1891. This is bourgeois jurisprudence at its most magnanimous. But in 1982 it is high time to state a plain fact and act on it: there is no true autonomy which is purely personal. Autonomy exists between people and within a world which surrounds the individual. The right to be let alone is a poor right if we are denied the right to associate: the right to form community.

Populism and socialism

Pharaoh is gone, but his work remains; the master has ceased to be master, but the slaves have not ceased to be slaves. A people trained for generations in the house of bondage cannot cast off in an instant the effects of that training and become truly free, even when the chains have been struck off.

Moses, Ahad Ha-'Am

When, during the November 1919 revolution, the masses were demonstrating in the Tiergarten in Berlin, most of the demonstrators took great care not to walk on the grass. This story, whether it is true or merely well-invented, sums up an important aspect of the tragedy of the revolutionary movement: the bourgeoisification of those who are to make the revolution.

What is Class-Consciousness? Wilhelm Reich, 1934

Obviously gays today are exercising much more than their right to be let alone; they are exercising their right to create communities and their right to publicity. Because gay social life and sexuality is often so playful and so visible on the streets of urban gay ghettos — in the very way gays dress and caress — this has drawn erotophobic damnation from conservatives, liberals, leftists and feminists alike. Richard Goldstein once wrote a superb article for the Village Voice (Oct 1, 1979) called, "I left my scalp in San Francisco: The Politics of Sexuality in an American Town." Concerning Mayor Feinstein, who had authorized raids on backroom bars, Goldstein wrote, "She will encourage a new gay leadership composed of people who have stable, successful lives and want others to have the same. She will encourage homosexuals to abandon their communalism and draw upon the same restraint that animates all middle-class life."

The Right to Privacy Committee's former chairperson, George Smith, has argued in the pages of TBP that the right to privacy may not be very radical, but it is a workable basis of unity for a coalition which fights for "our community's right to exist." I have the sincerest admiration for the work he and other RTPC members are engaged in and for the spirit they have shown. But it is precisely on those grounds — our community's right to exist — that we must question a concept and strategy which obscures as much as it clarifies. The raids on Canada's gay baths were not only an invasion of privacy, they were also an invasion of the semi-commercial, semi-communal life of the gay ghetto. It is primarily our public existence, and not our right to privacy, which is under assault by the right. That is why, for example, former State Senator Briggs of California tried to deny gay schoolteachers their right to teach. His main concern was to destroy the virus of gay liberation before children could catch the disease: gay liberation cannot be gay liberation unless it is contagious, as contagious as freedom itself.

The original basis of unity for the gay liberation movement was, in essence, quite simple. It remains quite revolutionary. Gay people have a right to freedom; gay people have a right to the world. When that world and that freedom have been won, then our right to privacy will finally be secure. The danger which concerned Warren and Brandeis in 1890 was that "what is whispered in the closet shall be proclaimed from the housetops." In 1982 we must certainly be on our guard against illegitimate surveillance of and intrusion into our personal and political lives. It helps to be a little paranoid when there is strange static on your phone and when your mail is tampered with. But the paramount concern for the gay liberation movement should remain our right to proclaim gay liberation from the housetops, and not the security of our closets. As our society stands, a lesbian president of General Motors or of the US would certainly be an extraordinarily successful deviant. Every sophisticated ruling class has made room at the top for some of the very people it oppresses. Gay liberation, however, means much more than integration — or accommodation — into a society which is based on domination.

I remember a demonstration in Philadelphia which was organized by a city councilman, a closeted gay businessman and a bunch of rabbis, priests and ministers. A rally was held at a corner where gays and prostitutes often cross paths, and speeches were made calling for the cops and politicians to sweep the whores, dope dealers and muggers off the streets. There had been crime and violence in the neighbourhood, and thus support was drummed up from gay business and gay neighbours, among others. Yet gays were used and abused by people who had no commitment to our freedom. We should have been the first to demand the decriminalization of prostitution, to demand the abolition of the Vice Squad, to question its relations with organized crime, to demand community-based patrols and to demand that hustlers and runaways be seen as persons, not simply as juvenile delinquents. Our economy will continue prostituting all of us until the nature of work itself changes in our society, whether we sell our brains and hands to a boss, or whether we sell our sex to a john. How many of us had our first taste of sexual, social and economic independence by hustling as young gay men? Many of us, if we look at the streets; many of us, if more of us were to tell the truth. Instead of showing gay solidarity with prostitutes and hustlers, we sold out to a pack of priests and politicians. We sold out to a Vice Squad which raided gay baths and bookstores. We built "unity" with our oppressors, and we built it on our own backs. It is this kind of populism which we must be wary of.

Spirit," wrote the anarchist and socialist Gustav Landauer, "is something that dwells equally in the hearts and animated bodies of all individuals, which erupts out of them with a natural compulsion as a binding quality and leads them to associate together. The state is never established inside the individual. It has never become an individual quality, never been voluntary. It resides rather in the centralism of command and discipline instead of in the center that rules the world of the spirit: that is the heartbeat and free independent thinking of the living body of the person." Spirit, as Landauer uses the term, is what Wilhelm Reich would have called "the self-governing character structure," and what I have been calling "autonomy."

In a crucial sense, Landauer was mistaken when he claimed "the state is never established inside the individual." An efficient state resorts to force and violence only rarely; it relies instead on enslaving spirits, so that each person becomes a "willing" building block in the pyramid of the state. Paraphrasing Landauer, it makes more sense to say that autonomy and authoritarianism are at odds in each person. And when we examine a populist phenomenon like the Nazi movement or the Moral Majority — without making glib equations — then we must paraphrase Landauer again: slavishness, too, is something that dwells equally in the hearts and animated bodies of all individuals, which erupts out of them with a natural compulsion as a binding quality and leads them to associate together.

Populist movements in the US have often been propelled by class struggle, but have blundered and broken apart when what passed for unity was, as in the case of many labor union drives, built by white men on the backs of women and blacks. A populist movement often pulls in two directions at once, revolutionary and reactionary, as in the case of the US anti-nuclear movement. It is revolutionary when people rise up and demand that Reagan and Brezhnev cease their international terrorism; it is reactionary when certain anti-nuclear forces express a "back-to-Nature" philosophy which keeps women barefoot and pregnant and puts gays beyond the pale. Likewise, what passes for feminism in sectors of the women's movement is sexist and Victorian. In the socialist movement itself, a "pro-family" trend has emerged which is, in fact, anti-feminist and anti-gay; patriarchal populism has plagued the left throughout its history. The same contradictory populism operates in the US gay movement, where some forces pursue gay rights in the narrowest sense, excluding gay liberation, and other forces pursue gay liberation in the fullest sense, including gay rights. Our right to privacy and our right to the world are both populist demands. But the right to privacy orients the gay movement in a conservative direction, not inconsistent with gay rights as such; whereas our right to the world is the soul of gay liberation and ultimately moves the gay movement beyond populism.

Gay liberation means creating a world in which heterosexist norms have been subverted. The social changes that involves would have revolutionary effects on every aspect of life, from child-rearing to the organization of the economy — to the very definition of sexuality itself.

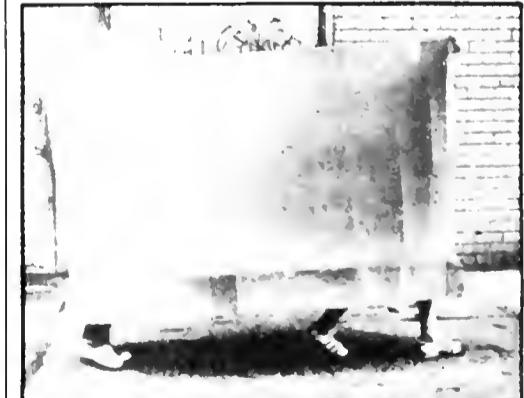

Conservative and liberal figures in the gay movement do not hesitate to state their goals and tactics, but gay socialists often do. We hesitate because the very terms of public discourse must change: in the gay movement, in the left, and in society at large. This is not the place to elaborate detailed strategy. But it is urgent to put the matter of gay liberation and socialism squarely and clearly before ourselves and everyone, gay and straight, men and women, people of all races, nationalities, occupations and classes. "Unity!" gay liberals and anti-reds will cry. "Unity!" will cry the patriarchs of the left. But we, too, seek unity: We will have neither gay liberation nor socialism if we don't have both together. We must insist on a conception of unity which is not new, but which must always be fought for and renewed. Having had unity built on our backs so often — in Hitler's Germany, in Castro's Cuba, in Falwell's America — we now insist on a unity built with the greatest democracy from below. We may fall short of that ideal, but we will not even approach it if we settle for "practical politics," meaning business-as-usual.

When the Nazis were on the rise in the mid-thirties, Wilhelm Reich argued for a radical synthesis of the personal and the political. One of Reich's conclusions was quite foolish: "the more clearly developed are the natural heterosexual inclinations of a juvenile, the more open he will be to revolutionary ideas; the stronger the homosexual tendency within him and also the more repressed his awareness of sexuality in general, the more easily he will be drawn toward the right." It is more accurate to say that sexual repression in gays and straights serves both the authoritarian right and left. Gay people, like all oppressed groups, respond to oppression with various strategies: some seek to survive unobtrusively; others seek to serve the existing order; still others seek to understand and change the very structure of society. Among gay rebels and radicals, a few try turning Reich's homosexual-reactionary equation around by equating sodomy with subversion. But there is nothing inherently radical in simply being gay. We have good reason to become socialists, but building a lesbian and gay left — as well as a broader socialist movement — requires some difficult and conscious steps.

Early in the century, Rosa Luxemburg wrote, "Indeed, union makes strength — but union of firm, inner conviction, not an external mechanical coupling together of elements that oppose each other internally. Strength lies not in our numbers, but in our spirit, in the clarity and energy animating us."

This kind of spirit, clarity and energy is what animated the gay liberation movement to seek "to transform the society at large through the realization of our own consciousness." Strength, of course, lies not only in our spirit but also in our numbers. If a right-wing technocrat like Richard Viguerie can use these words of William James as a motto, then so can we: "A small force, if it never lets up, will accumulate effects more considerable than those of much greater forces if these work inconsistently." []

Gays today are exercising much more than their right to be let alone; they are exercising their right to create communities and their right to publicity. Because gay sexuality is often so playful and so visible on the streets of urban gay ghettos, this has drawn erophobic damnation from conservatives, liberals, leftists and feminists alike."

When you first meet someone you are attracted to, a certain nervousness manifests itself. Barbara Hammer calls this "peak-out" — a feeling of half-delight and half-fear. I "peaked out" when I saw Hammer's work. For the first time, I was exposed to lesbian cinema that I liked.

Barbara Hammer, a San Francisco Bay Area lesbian feminist experimental filmmaker, has made some twenty-five films. Seven of them were screened at the Canadian Images Film Festival at Trent University in Peterborough on March 13, part of a series called A New Look: Women and Film 1982. Hammer's work offers a combination of lesbian sensuality, eroticism and aesthetic experience. Lesbian feminist aesthetics and politics are to influence the world, she says, and so she doesn't demand exclusively lesbian audiences anymore. She writes, "I show my films to a mixed crowd if the crowd 'feels' sensitive to me, because I don't think that we can any longer have a revolution in the closet."

During the Canadian Images Film Festival, Hammer's film, Multiple Orgasm, did not get listed in the programme. Another film, Dyketactics, was listed instead — with its first syllable deleted — and then not screened. Perhaps the programmers feared that to announce the screening of Multiple Orgasm would prompt outside intervention, and were trying not to jeopardize the presentation of other films. Perhaps we should be thankful that MO was screened at all. But this kind of defensive self-censorship is deplorable. It contributes to the lack of lesbian artistic visibility, itself made only too conspicuous by its absence.

Across Canada, women are organizing to fight pornography, and much literary debate has been devoted to the issue. In fact, pornography was the theme on the evening of March 12, when Hammer participated in a panel discussion called "Film, Feminism, Pornography... and Censorship."

The panel was moderated by Barbara Halpern Martineau, writer and critic, and Varda Burstyn, writer and theorist. Other speakers were Kerri Kwinter, writer and critic; Susan G Cole, journalist and cultural commentator; Bonnie Klein, filmmaker and director of Not A Love Story; Julia Lesage, feminist critic, teacher and co-editor of the radical film journal Jump Cut; and Paule Baillargeon, a Québécoise actress and filmmaker.

When Hammer's turn came, however, she said she would talk about eroticism, art and film. She spoke about the importance of touch, until the audience began to fidget. The psychic encounter — "intellectual sparking," or when "souls" touch — is, to her, real eroticism. To be able to show this phenomenon is true art, art that goes beyond the time/space of physical being. Hammer uses film to eliminate taboos and to achieve an interconnection of sight and touch, so that an audience can respond directly to a visual stimulus.

Sometimes Barbara Hammer gets categorized, since she has a foot in one door as an experimental filmmaker and the other as a lesbian feminist. "I'm too complex to be one thing or another, that's objectifying," she writes. And, as much as possible, "I try to educate my feminist audiences about experimental film and my film art audiences about feminism."

As a lesbian artist, Hammer stands at the vanguard of women's struggle for the removal of repressive, reprehensible self-images. She wants to overcome the sensual, tactile and erotic alienation that exists between many women. Her work conveys, as Jacqueline Zita comments in Jump Cut (25/26), "the overwhelming message that women have the power to touch themselves and other women who are drawn to them." We are multiple and infinite, no jouissance is the same and "women must write women, women must film women."

Currently, Barbara Hammer is working on an ambitious film project called Eros, Women's International Erotic Art Film, which will be a compilation of film shot by women all over the world depicting what they think/feel is erotic to them. Each woman makes a three-minute Super-8 film of what she considers erotic and sends it to Hammer. Hammer hopes to have a three-hour film of the identified imagery of women from about sixty countries. Hammer is hoping that women in Canada will participate. Please send the film to: Barbara Hammer/Goddess Films, Women's International Erotic Art Project, Box 2446, Berkeley, CA 94702 (telephone: 415-658-6959).

The strength of lesbian images: Some of Barbara Hammer's work

Arequipa (1981, 10 min) is a beautiful film. Windows and doorways lead into more windows and doorways, passages and courtyards, the camera exploring stone-textured spaces. The film was shot in an all-woman convent in Peru, and suggests the isolated interior life of the convent. Using dissolves and translucent blue and mauve paints, Hammer pulls us deeper into its recesses.

Pools (1981, 6 min) was made in collaboration with Barbara Klutinis. According to Hammer, the pool design is probably the most "female" architectural form. At William Randolph Hearst's castle in San Simeon, the camera records the luxurious splendour of pools and statues that were the work of architect Julia Morgan. Much of the film was shot underwater. As we float through the pools we are subjected to the soothing sound of continuously flowing water. Having probed the pools from many angles, Hammer experiments further with animation techniques. She applies brilliant colours in changing patterns, producing magical effects.

Haircut (1978, 6 min) was filmed on International Women's Day. An entertaining collage of Hammer's playful interaction with the woman cutting her hair, the film features frequent freeze-frames that show the gradual shortening of her wet hair caught in motion, and Hammer's changing facial expressions. Haircut symbolizes the freedom Hammer feels as a woman, as a lesbian, and as a filmmaker.

Our Trip (1980, 4 min) is an amusing animated film. A compilation of film, still photographs, and watercolour commutes Hammer's backpacking trip in Peru along the Inca trail with a lover, Corky Wick.

Sync Touch (1981, 10 min), billed as "Lesbian Aesthetics," portrays an intimate relationship between the filmmaker and her lover. Again, Hammer incorporates paint and synthesizes sight and touch in an effort to make people feel and be affected by the thing they are seeing. The voice-over states, "we all learn to touch first, and see later, and in seeing establish a new area of understanding connecting sight to touch." Despite the serious intent of her work, most of her films are imbued with humour. Cheek to cheek with her lover, Hammer repeats the French-speaking woman's enunciation of amorous aphorisms and scientific truisms, which are simultaneously subtitled.

Double Strength (1978, 16 min) was, to me, the most exhilarating of the seven films. Music and narrative accompany the visuals which trace the development of a passionate relationship between Hammer and a trapeze artist, Terry Sendgraff. The film captures the dizzying heights of pleasure that can occur between lovers; the trapeze is a metaphor for their love-making. Various breathtaking shots in the trapeze studio show the lovers' strength and agility; the camera almost caresses their flexing bodies. And the camera's presence is acknowledged: one sequence has Terry twisting the trapeze Barbara is standing on and Barbara is holding the camera. Then, losing contact with the ground, Terry spins below — wooden floor and skin whirling into a blur.

In a dim scene, with a voice-over that hints at the affair's dissolution, the sinuous body of her lover is shown clambering in a tree. Then split images of a dancer doing cartwheels are shown against a still full-screen image of a woman's face. But the euphoria of the trapeze sequence is recaptured and carried into a comic pixilated bedroom scene where they play with a string of Christmas tree lights and sparklers.

At intervals throughout the film, one can hear a telephone being dialed, and then disturbing busy signals. Toward the end, a heart begins to pound on the soundtrack, growing louder and faster as the romance fades. A close-up of Hammer's apprehensive face, filtered with blue, expresses anger and pain as she hears a recorded impersonal voice state, "the number you have dialed has been disconnected." This is Double Strength's crushing finale.

Multiple Orgasm shows Barbara in her most vulnerable state and it is her most courageous film. Onanism par excellence, the film shows Barbara masturbating with accompanying shots of her ecstatic facial expressions. "I wanted to see what I looked like," Hammer explains. Engorged arousal leads to an alleged eight orgasms. Superimpositions of erotic rock and cave formations soften the impact on the viewer and serve as an analogy to the folds and hollows of genitalia.

Hammer fantasized to perform the ten minutes of uninterrupted masturbation. During the shoot, she ran out of ideas. Her imaginative camera operator, who was at the far end of the room, suggested, "You are in a tent in the clearing of a jungle. You can feel the heat of the sun and hear sounds... the soft padding of a large black panther... she's coming nearer... she extends her long, soft tongue..."

Does Multiple Orgasm exemplify an artist's egotistic self-indulgence? Probably — but it works.

Barbara Hammer's films will soon be available through Canadian distributors. Both Women in Focus in Vancouver and the Canadian Film Co-op in Toronto will be offering a different selection of Hammer films.

Barbara Hammer will be returning to Canada in early October to screen and talk about her work. For specific information on dates and times, contact The Funnel, 507 King St E, Toronto, ON M5A 1M3.

Dennis Altman: "Homosexual" ten years later

The Homosexualization of America: The Americanization of the Homosexual by Dennis Altman. St Martin's Press, 1982.

I once pointed out, in a casual conversation, that gay people have not always existed, that in fact we seem to have appeared only quite recently in history.

The man with whom I was talking reacted much as if I had produced a knife and threatened to jam it between his ribs. He was sure that lots of ancient Greeks and Romans had been gay in just the way he was; to suggest that they were not just clones in togas was to challenge his fragile sense of legitimacy. Often truth is little enough protection — myths and fairy tales about our past are none at all. If Dennis Altman's new book can spread some sophistication around, we'll be better able to handle the people who oppose us.

As Altman observes, most of us still form our ideas about ourselves largely from the mainstream media. Popular gay culture is derived from those media, not from the gay press (extensive as it now is), and still less from the writings of gay intellectuals. For the past decade, gay and lesbian thinkers have been holding almost every aspect of our lives up to the light. If you want to find out what being gay is supposed to be about these days, but don't want to finger through learned journals or hoist 800-page tomes on 12th-century Easter Island gay love poems, you need something which draws together, in a clear and straightforward way, the various threads of what is termed "gay liberation." The Homosexualization of America: The Americanization of the Homosexual is just that.

The book's title misleadingly suggests a concern with two neatly symmetrical and reciprocal processes which, together, are shaping relations between American gay people and the society around them. But that's a violent simplification of the text. The America of the title is, in the first instance, the United States, but it also refers more broadly to all those democratic capitalist societies of which the US is generally regarded as a bellwether. The assumption, with occasional cautions thrown in, is that the experience of lesbians and gays in the United States is merely the fullest expression of tendencies throughout the West. The Americanization of the homosexual, then, is a convenient label for a process that has occurred in many countries. Although the context is mainly the US, illustrations are drawn from Australia, Canada, Britain, France, West Germany, Holland, Italy and other places.

In this process, it is said, the development of capitalism in the 19th century brought gay people into existence. Previously, there had been homosexuality and homosexual activity, but there were no homosexuals, no individual people identified by and with the activity. It was capitalism that first created the possibility of a life outside the family and heterosexuality. Nor has this pressure ceased to act: during recent decades, consumer capitalism has been reshaping us as a market and opening up the possibility of categorizing us as a minority group, an entity which democratic capitalist societies recognize and know how to deal with.

As for the other process, the homosexualization of America, it somewhat elastically encloses two distinct forces at work in Western societies. The first of these is the tendency of heterosexuals to become more like gays, adopting our attitudes, styles and, especially, our ways of dealing with love and sex. The other is the growing presence of acknowledged lesbians and gays within established institutions, particularly political parties, legislatures and the judiciary.

The text is suffused with a troubled appreciation for the way in which the conditions which allow the gay movement to advance also impose limitations on it. Singled out as especially difficult contradictions are: the different and occasionally antagonistic interests of the two sexes; the localization of homosexual desire in a particular group although it is known to be part of the make-up of most of the population; and the emerging emphasis on masculinity among just that group of men, gay men, who have an interest in abolishing gender distinctions. (This last point strikes me as merely wilful; after all, the signs of masculinity cease to have social force when they are removed from the setting of a heterosexual orientation.)

These are not new ideas; they have been in the air and in print in the limited circles of gay intellectuals since the late 70s. But by assembling them in a coherent and popular form, Altman is passing them along to a large audience to whom they will be novel, challenging and even unsettling.

Although this book is a "popularization," I don't mean to suggest that you can breeze through it in a single bus ride. There's a lot here to mull over. For example:

"What often appears to straight critics as an obsession with sex is more accurately a preoccupation with constructing relationships that can meet our needs for both security and independence, commitment and variety."

Or this jab at the respectability-at-all-costs school of gay liberation:

"One cannot counter an oppression based on irrational and complex fears and repressions in the same way as one lobbies for tariff reductions."

Two things make the book less successful than it might be. First, there is that quirky title. I found myself reading the text with the aim of figuring the title out and I often had the feeling that the author had written it with the same aim. I suspect that the title (as well as the red, white and blue cover) was chosen to appeal to the ethnocentric, but profitable, US market. If so, the book suffers for it.

The other problem is that in places the line of argument gets lost in a hail of diversions, citations and illustrations. I frequently wished the writer had resisted the temptation to toss in just one more quotation or make one more point.

But these are not large objections. The profusion of bibliographic citations — as many as 94 to a chapter — may strike some readers as too academic, but the references constitute a valuable reading list, and often enough you'll want to take a look at the article or book in question. The chapters of the book are reasonably self-contained.

If you do tire of documentation, skip to the end for inspiration. I have no doubt that most readers will find the

"The really terrible thing about oppression is that you can't show it without showing the person who's being oppressed, and who also has his faults."

— RW Fassbinder, 1946-1982 —

Rainer Werner Fassbinder, leading spirit in the post-war revival of West German cinema, was found dead in his Munich home June 10. During his audacious and hectic career spanning just 13 years, Fassbinder directed more than forty films, some of them unique explorations of gay life and relationships: The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant (1973), Fox and His Friends (1975, in which Fassbinder himself starred) and In a Year With Thirteen Moons (1979), made after the suicide of Fassbinder's lover.

Film was for Fassbinder an irresistibly dangerous "holy whore." He described his often ruthless examination of the socio-psychological climate of modern bourgeois Germany as "melodrama run amok," acknowledging his debt to the glossy melodramas of Douglas Sirk and Hollywood films of the 50s. His last completed project is a film version of Jean Genet's Querelle de Brest.

chapter on "Sexual Freedom and the End of Romance" the most engaging part of the book. The central thought here is this:

"What so many discussions of gay sexuality have missed is that there is no necessary connection between sexual freedom and emotional commitment, that the idea of monogamy and love are quite distinct and are only confused because of certain social pressures."

Armed with a willingness to contemplate the disentanglement of love and sex, Altman examines the association of gay sex with promiscuity and kinkiness. He concludes that, while these terms are loaded, they refer to aspects of sexuality which we are pioneering and which straights, lost at sea after the foundering of marriage and family life, may want to claim for their own.

In a final essay, "A Personal Conclusion," Altman recalls his earlier book, Homosexual Oppression and Liberation, published ten years ago. In it, he predicted that gay liberation would lead rapidly to the dissolution of the male/female distinction and the triumph of "feminine" values. Of course nothing of the sort has happened, and Altman makes no bones about his nostalgia for those idealistic days.

But that earlier book reflected a brand-new social movement, born in a flash and expanding into a vacuum. It had to rely on ideas borrowed from feminism, psychoanalysis and traditional socialism because there was no articulate body of gay politics to draw lessons from and build on. In the intervening years, gay people have accumulated a diverse and extensive political experience. It is this which Altman's new book reflects; it is very much the product of a mature community, sure of itself, capable of self-criticism, confident of its place in history, and infused with an appropriate sense of mystery and destiny.

Bottom-line taboo

Anal Pleasure and Health, by Jack Morin, PhD, Down There Press, Box 2086, Burlingame, CA 94010, 1981. $16.75

I must admit that, as I sat down to write this review, I had to fight the urge to adopt a condescending, flippant tone. After all, a whole book on getting in touch with one's anus seems like overkill. This is an important work, however, about a strong social taboo — the enjoyment of one's anus, a subject usually dealt with by even the most liberated person in an uninformed trial-and-error manner, and about which even the most enlightened health professional would have trouble finding sound information, let alone knowing how to help patients incorporate their anuses into their sexual lives safely and pleasurable. Dr Morin, author of last year's Men Loving Themselves (on exploring masturbation), has had the courage and imagination to find the information, to develop means of helping people overcome their personalized versions of the taboo and now to present his expertise for others to use.

The first chapters are steeped in the mellow air of California and its touchy-feely approach to solving life's difficulties, which for me at least is hard to take seriously. Reading that I should look upon my anus as my friend, however true, only makes me want to snicker. It may well be, as Morin suggests, that such reactions are the residual effects of indoctrination that the anus is disgusting, but surely one can deal with such attitudes in a way that is less cute. This Gestalt-influenced approach will be useful for some but a hindrance to others, perhaps precisely because it can arouse such feelings easily. I hope, however, that others will not allow this reaction, as I nearly did, to mask the value of the book's content.

Self-examination guide from Anal Pleasure and Health; author Morin (below): "steeped in the mellow air of California and its touchy-feely approach," but a valuable guide to free choice over indoctrination

By now, some of you may be asking what the point is: if you like anal sex, you learn how to do it and if not, you don't. This is a common stance among those who either don't have problems with sexual functioning or don't recognize the problems they do have, but in either case, this book would probably benefit them more than they will ever allow themselves to discover.

For those not experiencing anal sexual difficulties, the book contains appropriate and sound anatomical and physiological information in learning what exactly is happening down there that is so nice. This does not remove the mystery of good sex, nor does it clutter one's mind with unexciting or even inhibiting clinical information, but it does provide knowledge about what is normal for those inevitable times when something goes wrong, be it a rectal infection, sexual trauma or, God forbid, an inexplicable failure to respond as comfortably, easily or satisfyingly as usual. There is a fine appendix covering the common anorectal problems of both a sexual and nonsexual nature, all of which should be familiar certainly to anally active men and women, if not to everybody. It is astounding how often I see men with anal pain, for example, who have not even looked to see if something has changed visibly, let alone have an idea of what is occurring.

Those who stand most to gain from reading Anal Pleasure and Health, however, are those who want to become anally active but have not been able to. The most common reason is that anal intercourse is felt as painful, which indeed it can be. What is often not realized is that it is not necessarily the insertion of something into the anus which is painful, but usually the involuntary spasm of the anal sphincter muscles themselves, and that these muscles are under a large degree of voluntary control. The book contains a gently graded series of exercises to gain the ability to relax and avoid anospasm. There are also those who, though they don't find anal sex painful, don't enjoy it as much as they want to. Here Morin has been helpful in allowing feelings to surface about things such as encountering feces or about the dynamics of power struggles and sex roles, allowing suppressed reasons for ambivalence to be dissipated. The chapter, "Power and Anal Pleasure," is an excellent discussion of the potentially intricate forces at play in sexual relationships, and should be

Glamour and history

A History of Shadows by Robert C Reinhart. Avon. 1982. $2.95

"This," the veteran book-cover studier tells himself, spying A History of Shadows on his favourite seller's shelf, "is probably one of Avon's gay potboiler romances, full of glamour, drugs, money and sex." Which only goes to prove an old adage too familiar to need repeating.

Shadows is the narration by four friends of their lives (particularly as gays) from the Thirties to the Sixties. There is, it must be admitted, glamour and money aplenty. Wesley, for example, is a second-rank Hollywood star who can (and does) sleep with anyone.

In his first season, Brassard will direct a French version of Australian Steve J Spears's The Elocution of Benjamin Franklin, about the internal and external oppression a voice teacher experiences when he falls in love with a male student.

Brassard told a press conference he felt it "necessary to do in my first season... it's part of my life." He went on to say that he feels he has "the real privilege of being gay. I see that tradi-

And Robert is a financier with the endearing quality of being able to turn his friends' small investments into not-so-small fortunes. Despite the Never Never Land settings, however, the stories are solid and convincing. They are primarily about growing up and living gay, and their premise is that, even for these men, it meant lying and self-dislike, having an emotional and sexual existence unacknowledged by society, living distorted relationships. It also fortunately, meant warm friendships, some wonderful love affairs and often great sex.

Not, mind you, that we see any of that commodity. Reinhart has kindly spared us Avon-sex (such as "I could feel his sensitive fingers gingerly explore me as though I were a precious and delicate Ming vase he feared to break by too rough handling"). The format of the book, interwoven interviews with the four men looking back over their lives, makes that kind of nonsense inappropriate. The avoidance of any explicitly sexual terms, however, is somewhat too careful, suggesting that sex, after all, is still dirty and just not the thing in a serious novel. I also object to the series of introductory essays that begin each new era in the men's lives. They are history with all the sweep, passion, gusto and superficiality of a James A Michener novel, and undermine the realism in the remainder of the book.

As the historians among us are uncovering some of our invisible pasts, it is tantalizing to see the same being attempted on a fictional level. Light reading it still is, but light reading with focus and information, and a point of view more challenging than "sex is beautiful between beautiful men."

The Great Canadian Column

No one has been so crass as to mention it; but, despite my good intentions, this column has been missing what some readers may regard as a vital element — Canadian content. While I could never be accused of being a card-carrying nationalist (reasonable, considering I'm 50% American in mind, spirit and parentage), the materials reviewed in this column have been geographically representative of the books and periodicals I received. In other words, it isn't my fault! But this month, I've made a special effort to make amends with those of you who have been forced to choose between me and flag-and-country.

I was impressed by the review copies I received from Fireweed, and I was even more impressed to learn that the Fireweed Collective is presently working on a special lesbian issue that should be on the stands at the end of July. Fireweed has a wonderful track record — they've published twelve issues in a little more than three years — and the quality of the writing and graphics just keeps getting better. The collective seems to have a special interest in theme issues (a trend, perhaps?), and Issue 11, on popular culture, is a real treat, with an article on lesbian pulps, an interview with three soap-opera junkies and a tee-hee quiz on the Royal Wedding. (Honestly, where else could I learn the phrase "Virgo Intacta"? I'll give you a hint: you can't marry a prince without being one!) The in-the-works lesbian issue promises work by Mary Meigs, an interview with Latin American lesbians on their lifestyle in Colombia and a special archival piece on an early Canadian lesbian couple, a writer and a photographer who lived and worked together for more than thirty years. The issue is being edited by lesbians throughout the country, women such as Jovette Marchessault (Quebec), Cy-Thea Sand and Barbara Herringer (West), and Lynne Farnie and Pamela Godfree (Toronto and area). The special issue promises a great deal. And, considering the work Fireweed has produced to this point, there is no doubt they will deliver all they claim, and probably more.

Too often in small-press publishing, it's the writers who know the most people or make the most noise who get all the attention, while hard-working, skilful writers (who are too busy writing and working to go after the PR) go unnoticed. One example is local lesbian writer Suniti Namjoshi. Her name may not be a household word, but she has written some of the best poetry I have read. I liked the poems in The Authentic Lie and The Jackass and The Lady, when I read them; I liked them even better after hearing the poet read them aloud. It's hard to resist lines like:

I give her the rose with unfurled petals
She smiles

and crosses her legs
I give her the shell with the swollen lip
She laughs. I bite

and nuzzle on her breasts
I tell her "Feed me on flowers with wide open mouths"

and slowly
— she pulls down my head.

Namjoshi has also written Feminist Fables, a book of myths re-written from a feminist perspective. The myths have a sharp, satirical bite to them, and the reader both winces and laughs at the absurd realities that make up Namjoshi's life in a patriarchal world. For example, from a story called "Broadcast Live":

The incredible woman raged through the skies, lassoed a planet, set it in orbit, rescued a starship, flattened a mountain, straightened a building, smiled at a child, caught a few thieves, all in one morning and then, took a little time off to visit her psychiatrist, since she is at heart a really womanly woman and all she wants is a normal life.

This book deserves a lot of attention.

Women in the Kitchener-Waterloo area have been at work for almost two years producing a fine magazine that deserves much more attention than it gets.

Hysteria is a feminist magazine that also thinks in terms of theme issues (it is a trend, I'm convinced), and their most recent issue on women and sexuality is excellent. There is a great deal of lesbian content in Hysteria and required reading for this particular issue is "5 to 9", a journal-like article that accurately compares an evening spent with a man to one spent with a woman. The writing is extremely honest — and we all know who came out ahead. Upcoming issues will deal with women of the future and women and machines. All issues contain book reviews, poetry and regular features. And a number of the collective members are skilled professional printers; their talents are reflected in the graphics and design of Hysteria. Truly good stuff. □

Note: Last month's column warned readers that "if you are looking for light reading and an obvious plot, don't touch Crazy Quilt" it should have read, "if you are looking for light reading, don't touch Bones and Kim." The editor, who will stop at nothing to change a pronoun reference to a substantive, apologizes for any confusion.

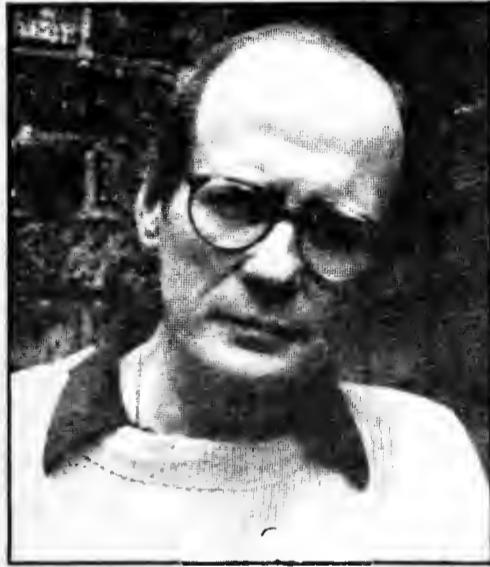

Son of The Male Muse

Among the new books of poems, two arrive with news of the untimely deaths of their authors. James L White's The Salt Ecstasies ($5, Graywolf Press, Box 142, Port Townsend, WA 98368) is the quieter and more impressive of the two. Though its first poem is entitled "An Ordinary Composure," White's composure is far from ordinary, as shown in these lines from a piece called "Skin Movers":

How still we are in sleep
as though morning holds its breath.
Our bodies rinsed with light
like soaked birch.
Half awake I travel down you again.
Crow, dark crow, we smell of burnt leaves and wine,
the night before taking crystals bitter as Jesuit Root.
Now we turn slowly in the weight of love,
the way ships move heavily between moon and sun, not lost
but like a well-piloted dream...
...Good love is like this.
Even the smell of baked bread won't make it better,
This being out of myself for awhile.

During the time most of these poems were written, White knew he was dying of what he called his "bad old heart."

Axel Soestmeyer's Rush of Wings ($5, Guernica Editions, Box 633, Stn NDG, Montreal H4A 3R1) is a far different book. These are tormented, wor-

White: quiet composure and "a bad old heart"

dy poems, often reflective of the author's European ties (Soestmeyer was born and lived in Germany and grew up in the American midwest). And there is none of White's acceptance of his sexuality. Soestmeyer's work is riddled with words like "barren," "crippled," "stunted." And in lines like "of pastlove's full-feel now forenooned by subjection" and "nor can you naysay that we swam/in tides of mutually protracted pleasure," his writing tends to be literally unspeakable. Coupled with the pained self-pity, this makes for a dismal read. The book is adorned with a glossary for those unfamiliar with words like "cinereal" and "temulence."

Stanley Ward's Cruikshank ($9.95, Quincunx, 235 S 15th St, Philadelphia, PA 19102) would have been a better book with some severe editing — something few small presses are able to give. It includes too many duds, but some of the narratives about what used to be called "rough trade" are very effective and erotic, like "Ten O'Clock at the Town Pump," about jerking off a tattooed young stud in a topless bar:

...Pressing his hard thigh tightly against my dangling hand, he drew a jackknife from his jeans and placed it, closed, on top of the table, whispering: "I never wear skivvies, man, and

I just cut
a big slit in my right pocket —
stick your hand in and feel me up."

We watched together the terpsichorean
tits

parading in pairs — to a punk beat my five left fingers lacked dexterity to match. He casually reached for a Camel

and tapped it on the table instinctively:
"Jack it slowly, man, and when I shoot, wipe your hand on my nuts."...

Charles Henri Ford is (with the late Parker Tyler) the author of the classic gay novel The Young & Evil, still fresh and interesting after half a century. His latest, Om Krishna II: From the Sickroom of the Walking Eagles ($4, The Book Bus, 31 Prince St, Rochester, NY 14216) is, with its earlier companion volume, an ambitious essay at a long poem. Seemingly influenced by Asian poetry and William Burroughs, it's more successful in some of its lines and passages than as a whole.

Novelist Thomas Disch's Orders of the Retina ($7.50, Toothpaste Press, West Branch, Iowa 52358) is a collection of poems in different modes. Some of these are technically accomplished, but the book as a whole makes little impression.

In 1973, I published a book called The Male Muse. This was the first of the anthologies of gay poetry and featured such luminaries as Paul Goodman, Robert Duncan, Allen Ginsberg, Jonathan Williams, Thom Gunn, Christopher Isherwood and Tennessee Williams. For some of these, appearance in The Male Muse constituted a literary "coming out." The book has been very popular and has gone into four printings (with a fifth coming up).

A number of fine gay anthologies have been published since, but people continue to ask me when I'm going to do a sequel. So: Son of The Male Muse will be born, all being well, in 1983, ten years later.

The criteria for the new book will be somewhat different: I'd like it to be a more general anthology of poets who have played some part in the gay literary scene. For the most part, these will be writers whose work has come to notice (or at least to my notice) since the earlier volume. No-one who was in The Male Muse will be included. And not only "gay poems" will be used; the aim is to give a good representation of each writer's work.

So if you write poetry, whether it's been published before or not, please send submissions to me c/o TBP. It's important to include four things: a brief biographical sketch (this can really be anything you'd like to say but should include the year of your birth); a complete list of your books and chapbooks; if any (with dates and publishers); a b&w photo of yourself suitable for reproduction (preferably at least 5" x 7"); and return postage in Canadian stamps, International Reply Coupons or cheque.

Gay sex is still illegal if either or both parties are under 21, or if more than 2 people are involved, regardless of their ages. Please word your ad accordingly. We reserve the right to alter or refuse any ad.

Remember, too, your ad is reaching other people, not just a box number. So it's smart to be positive about yourself, not insulting to others. We will edit out phrases like "no blacks" or "no fats or fems."

Answering an ad. No charge — just put your reply in an envelope and address it as in the diagram. Be sure the drawer number is on the outside of the envelope. Office staff do not open any mail addressed to a drawer.

How to do it. Write one word per box. The amount in the box when you finish is the basic cost of your ad. Mail your ad along with your payment to us at: TBP CLASSIFIEDS, Box 7289, Station A, Toronto, ON M5W 1X9.

More to say? Just keep writing on a separate sheet of paper, at a cost of 25¢ per word. Business ads: 50¢ per word.
